DEDICATION

Not as before, to ten bold fellows, gay,
Who prematurely left us, as they say;
Nor to some "Prof" of whose renown we dream
Because a "flunk" from him is never seen.
Not to our team, of whose brave but uphill fight
We've heard enough—let no more come to light.
Not to ourselves, although we may believe
The praise we get is not all we should receive;
But to that which we never knew before
Had long existed, just beyond our door.
A place that we have often coldly passed,
Whose presence we have come to know at last.
Then to our Gym, that gift of unkind Fate,
This book, with hope, we do now dedicate.

PROLOG

To win the race on cinder path
The sprinter trains for many weeks.
The fair co-ed writes page on page—
The prize essay she vainly seeks.
The orator grows hoarse in vain
And ne'er complains about it.
The football hero hears his name
Whene'er the rooters shout it,
And counts himself quite well repaid
For broken limbs and bruises.
All praise the lucky team that wins,
And "roast" the one which loses.
But we, whose duty 'tis to write
Of student pastime, labor—
And 'gainst our will must still recite
The Faculty's behavior,
Find little comfort, when we think
Of our reward for telling
What all are anxious should be known
Save he whom we are "selling."
So gentle readers, when you see
Your names upon these pages,
Don't call the Editors bad names;
Just look as wise as sages.

JAMES RENWICK GUTHRIE, A. M., M. D.

Dean of the College of Medicine

THE new Dean of the College of Medicine is a true son of Iowa and of her best institutions, who brings to the service of the University that filial devotion and enthusiastic interest in her progress which especially adapts him to assume the charge of Iowa's first medical school.

James Renwick Guthrie was born on July 23, 1858, near Hopkinton, Iowa, the son of parents who were among Iowa's earliest pioneers. At the age of fifteen he entered Lenox College, from which he graduated in June 1878 with the degree of Bachelor of Science. In June 1881, having completed the required graduated work, he received the degree of Master of Arts from his alma mater. He came to the State University of Iowa in September, 1881, to enter the Medical Department, graduating with the class of 1884, being honored by his class with the election as commencement orator and his oration of "William Jenner" was a literary production of unusually high merit. After pursuing post graduate work in New York City he entered upon the practice of his profession in the city of Dubuque, Iowa, which has ever since been his home, and in a constantly increasing field of activity he has earned the esteem of all of his professional brethren. His career as an instructor in the University of Iowa dates from the year 1889 when he was called by the Board of Regents to the Chair of Physiology and Histology, to succeed the late Doctor Richard W. Hill. In addition to the teaching work connected with this chair, he delivered a special course of lectures in 1894 and 1895 on Diseases of Children, and in 1893 he was appointed assistant to the Chair of Obstetrics and Gynecology, having charge of the instruction in Obstetrics. Upon election of Doctor J. C. Shrader in 1898 to Professor Emeritus, Doctor Guthrie was transferred to full charge of the Chair of Obstetrics and Gynecology, which professorship he holds at the present time. His appointment as Dean of the College of Medicine to succeed the late lamented Doctor Middleton was made at the meeting of the Board of Regents July 22, 1902. From the colleagues of his profession Dean Guthrie has received ample recognition of the esteem in which he is held.

He has been honored with various high offices in the Iowa State Medical Society and at the meeting in Davenport in 1901 he was unanimously chosen president of the society. At the meeting of the American Medical Association at Atlantic City, N. J. in 1900 he was elected to membership on the Judicial Council, and at the meeting of the Association in Buffalo, N. Y., last year he was one of the two delegates to represent the Iowa State Society. He has been a liberal contributor to current medical literature and to the programs of State and National Association meetings, especially on the special branch of work in which he is engaged. As a lecturer he has gained an enviable reputation, and aside from purely medical subjects, his orations on Sleep, Robert Burns, and Oliver Wendell Holmes have been a treat and a delight to a host of friends and acquaintances. In the unusual progress that has characterized the growth of the College of Medicine during the last decade and a half, Doctor Guthrie has taken a very active part, and especially in his warm advocacy of increasing the standard of medical education. By reason of his extensive acquaintance in medical circles, his standing as a physician and an educator, together with a most winning personality, Dean Guthrie is eminently fitted for the new responsibilities that are in store for him. To the beloved Middleton who was idealized alike by student and colleagues, he is destined to make a most worthy successor.

EDWIN KEECH BROWN

HEN, on the morning of May 3, 1902, the news reached Iowa City that Edwin K. Brown had defeated the representatives of the seven leading universities of the middle west, and brought honor to the S. U. I. at the contest of the Northern Oratorical League at Chicago, those who had watched his career as a debater and orator felt that at last he had received the due reward which years of labor and training could not fail to bring to one so gifted.

Mr. Brown began his career, which was to culminate in the highest honor possible to the University orator, in the Academy at Iowa City. Here he won the annual oratorical contest, and when he graduated, it was but a prophesy of future success that he should be chosen valedictorian of his class.

Upon the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, Mr. Brown enlisted in Company I, Fiftieth Iowa Regiment, and served until the close of the war.

Entering the University upon his return, he won the Freshman oratorical contest and was chosen to represent the Zetagathian society in the Iowa-Minnesota preliminary debate.

Early in his Sophomore year, with the nine classmates who composed the "Immortal Ten," he was called upon to answer to the charge of detaining the Freshman president from the annual banquet, and suffered suspension until the end of the year. This enforced absence from the University he improved by entering Highland Park College at Des Moines, where he won the annual oratorical contest.

Returning to the University as a Junior in September, 1901, Mr. Brown won a place on the Iowa-Wisconsin final debating team, and with his able colleagues, Messrs. Spangler and Kemmerer, won a brilliant victory for Iowa, defeating a strong Wisconsin team.

Winning the home oratorical contest held in March was the last step in his career preliminary to his final victory, and by it he became Iowa's representative to the N. O. L. contest, where with his splendid oration, "The March of the Constitution," he won first place, and convinced judges and audience alike that Iowa's orators were worthy of first honors, even when placed in competition with so formidable an array of opponents. Second place was won by Thomas D. Schall, of Minnesota, with Bertram C. Nelson, of Chicago, a close third.

Until last year the highest standing attained by an Iowa orator in the N. O. L. contests was third place, won by Otto Brackett, of the Philomathian society the year previous.

What our prospects are for the future cannot, of course, be definitely known, but as Mr. Brown so truly and modestly put it, when amid the cheers of his fellow-students he responded to their admiring demonstrations at his return with a short speech,—with Professor Gordon to train them, there is no reason why Iowa's speakers cannot always win high positions, for S. U. I. is still the best of universities.

For the present, Iowa may well be proud of her splendid victory and of the man who won it. Mr. Brown is now a member of the Phi Delta Theta fraternity, a Junior in the College of Law and a Senior in the College of Liberal Arts. His ability and forensic talents predict for him a successful career in his chosen profession.

RUDOLPH MARTIN ANDERSON

CAPTAIN of TRACK TEAM

RUDOLPH MARTIN ANDERSON, winner of the 1902 Max Mayer cup for joint excellence in scholarship and athletics, began his training under "Dad" Moulton, in his freshman year, 1898. He did not compete that season, however, but enlisted in Co. F, 52d Iowa Infantry at the outbreak of the Spanish-American war, and served as private and corporal until mustered out. Re-entering the University, he ran his first college race with the 1900 track team in a dual meet with Grinnell, winning second place in the 440 yard dash and running on the successful relay team. In the underclassmen's meet of the same year, he won the 100 yard dash, the 220, and second place in the 440 yard dash. At the state meet he ran with the S. U. I. relay team which established the record of 1:36 for the half-mile. In 1901, on account of sickness, Mr. Anderson was unable to enter the more important meets, but in 1902 he won the 440 yard dash at the home meet in 56 2-5 seconds, and set a new University record for the high hurdles at 16 2-5 sec. In the Minnesota meet he secured second place in the high hurdles and at the State Meet, second in both hurdle races, running also with the relay team which established the new record of 1:34 2-5 for the half mile. At the end of the season he was re-elected captain for 1903.

Besides being an athlete, Mr. Anderson is an excellent student. He is a member of Sigma Xi and for three years has been assistant in the Museum. In 1901, he won the Mrs. Wm. Larrabee prize in Zoology. In 1902 he won the Wienecke medal for the best drilled man in the University battery and the Col. Geo. R. Burnett medal for marksmanship in the University Battalion.

He has twice won the Shrader medal for the best drilled soldier in Co. I, I. N. G., where he now holds the position of Quartermaster Sergeant. He was captain of the University battery in 1902 and is now Major and Assistant Commandant of the University Battalion.

Mr. Anderson is also a member of the Polygon and Edda literary societies, an associate member of Baconian and a member of the Daily Iowan Staff. His high scholarship, his earnestness in training and his kindly interest in the development of new men qualify him admirably for the position of track captain.

The VARSITY

THE uncrossed goal line has become one of the sacred memories of the past. Bon fires and dances by white robed students are not seen on the streets as of yore. Nor is it considered good taste to throng about the telegraph headquarters during an out of town game. To be brief, the team of 1902 suffered about all the disasters that ever befell a foot ball team. But this is not pleasant to dwell upon and besides we have no excuses to offer.

The preliminary training at Camp Butler gave signs of great promise for the coming season. Coaches and men seemed thoroughly in earnest, the new material was especially good and followers of the game were elated over the prospects.

The team began the season right by defeating the Normal in a rather one sided game, although allowing them to score one touchdown. The Drake game was rather a disappointment, although Coach Dietz's proteges were sure victims.

Simpson proved a surprise, and Minnesota quenched all championship aspirations by a decisive victory over the home team on Iowa field. Iowa stock went down.

Coach Ristine and his aggregation were next on the list. They have been accused—whether justly or not we cannot say—of secretly coveting the State championship. They came with a large and loyal delegation of rooters, among whom were many fair Co-eds. It was a hard fight and the result hung long in the balance until by courtesy of the opponents Dwight Griffith was allowed to run half the length of the field for the winning touch down.

There were several other games played last season. We refrain from mentioning any more however for want of space.

The work of the team was erratic. There were plenty of good individual players, but united effort and team work were almost wholly wanting. In general the plays lacked snap and ginger. Charging in the line was not developed until late in the season. The backs ran high and were uncertain in tackling.

The best showing was made in some of the minor games where the helping spirit and its beneficial results were quite evident, and which revealed what great possibilities were within the team.

The season and its lessons are over. The Iowa rooters have proven themselves loyal in the face of defeat. If it is true that we profit by our misfortunes, let us all unite in a common determination to make the foot ball team of 1903 worthy of its most illustrious predecessors.

All honor to the men who did their best in the face of adversity.

The SCRUBS

FOOT BALL has often been condemned as a form of college athletics because of the limited number of men who receive benefit from it. These objections vanish, however, in the presence of such spectacles as the foot ball field presented almost any evening last fall, when from forty to fifty men appeared in uniform for daily practice. It is hardly probable that all of these men will win their "I's" but they do receive a physical and moral training which is well worth their time and besides that, the reminiscences and friendships of the gridiron are among the most cherished of a man's college days. The work of the scrubs was eminently successful. The men came out regularly and worked willingly, giving the coaches a chance to develop true foot ball players instead of merely instructing men in a few of the rudiments of the game and sending them upon the field to represent the University in her contests. Their playing was marked by consistency and was often much more snappy and aggressive than that of the Varsity. The schedule of the second teams was somewhat limited owing to unforeseen circumstances. They were defeated once by Lennox, tied by Cornell second team and defeated Lennox in a return game. Coach Hobbs succeeded in developing some very good material with which to recruit the ranks of the Varsity next fall.

TRACK TEAM

THE story of the 1902 track team is an account of great accomplishments from small beginnings. The outlook at the opening of the season was indeed unpromising. A few men had been taking advantage of the small facilities offered by the gymnasium and they formed the nucleus of what afterwards became a very creditable team. With the arrival of Dr. Knipe about the last of March, the men began systematic work on the track. Prospects did not brighten rapidly, however. Finances were low and few of the old point winners were in school; moreover, the hopes of some very promising aspirants were blighted by the heartless Prof's.

Competition for places was keen and spirited in all except the weight events. Strong men seemed to be at a premium in the University.

Considerable interest centered in the home meet which occurred on May 1. This contest was greatly strengthened by the presence of the medical students, the Freshmen of that department winning the Chantland cup, while Swift established a new discus record.

The customary meet with Grinnell was cancelled owing to the lateness with which the season opened, giving the men too little time to get in shape for it.

The Dual Meet with Minnesota took place on the home field. The odds were conceded by all to be greatly in favor of the opponents, but Iowa came out with three points to her credit, only firsts being counted.

By the time of the State Field Meet, the Iowa team was in fairly good condition. They made no boasts, but went up to Des Moines with quiet determination to "go for every ounce that was in them" as the coach was in the habit of telling them. Whether or not second place is worthy of the dignity of the State University we do not presume to say. At any rate, the men did their best without exception as is shown by the fact that they broke two state records, viz., the discus throw and the half mile relay.

The Conference Meet also yielded honors to Iowa when Swift upon the third trial hurled the discus 118 feet 6½ inches, breaking the Conference record and giving us five points.

The S. U. I. students as a body are taking more interest now in track athletics than ever before. The organization of the cross country club has served a double purpose. It has kept the men in condition throughout the winter, and at the same time the inter-class contests inaugurated during the fall season have developed an interest and competition hitherto unknown which cannot fail to produce athletes where were before but men of mediocre ability.

CHARLES H. SWIFT

CHARLES H. SWIFT first discovered that he could throw the discus in the spring of 1902. Until then he had taken practically no part in athletics either before or after entering the university. He attended the Ida Grove, Ia., high school, and after graduation worked on his father's ranch in western Nebraska until entering the university in 1900 as a Freshman Medic. Not until his Sophomore year, however, did Fortune lead him to try discus throwing and even then his first efforts were rewarded with but ordinary success, his first throws not exceeding 45 or 50 feet. Not becoming discouraged, Mr. Swift kept persistently at work, with no especial aid from coach or trainer, developing by himself a form nearly perfect and finally achieving a most brilliant success. At the Home Meet in 1902, Mr. Swift appeared in citizens clothes, won his first athletic contest and established the Varsity record of 113 feet for the discus. He also won second place in the shot put in this meet. In the Minnesota Meet he won first place and raised his previous record to 114 ft. 2 in., winning also third place in the shot put. In the State Meet at Des Moines he won the state championship and his event, breaking the state record formerly held by Smith, of Drake, and raising it from 111 ft. 2 in. to 113 ft. 6 in. His greatest throw was made at the Conference Meet at Chicago, where he defeated all competitors and established a new record of 118 ft. 9 in., for this great group of Universities of the Middle West. Last fall Mr. Swift joined the foot ball squad and speedily won a place as substitute on the first team for the first of the season. His first game was played against Washington University, where he proved his right to a position on the team as guard. In the game with Missouri, however, he was injured during the first five minutes of play, and compelled to give up playing for the rest of the season. Besides his success in athletics Mr. Swift's popularity among his fellow students is evidenced by the fact that he was chosen this year as President of the '04 Medical Class. His record thus far has been such as to inspire high hopes among the track enthusiasts at the S. U. I. and not a few expect to see the world's record for discus throwing held by this Iowa athlete.

TENNIS

We take much pleasure in recounting the record of the 1902 Varsity Tennis Team. Although weakened by the loss of Ellis, the star of '01, the team composed of the Bailey brothers, Marsh and Hull, was one for which the University was to be congratulated. The annual match with Minnesota occurred on the home courts. The contestants were evenly matched and the playing was hard and fast from the very beginning. The meet finally resulted in a tie both in doubles and singles. The State tournament resulted much to the credit of the Iowa players, they being victorious in both singles and doubles. On May 23 the team went to Chicago, where they met and defeated Northwestern, returning the compliments of three years ago. Following that they engaged in a dual meet with Chicago University which, however, was not completed because of bad weather. The inter-collegiate meet held in Chicago wound up the college tennis season. This was taken part in by Michigan, Wisconsin, Northwestern, Armour Institute, Chicago University and Iowa. The final outcome was a victory for Michigan, but our representatives, Messrs. Ed. and J.W. Bailey, proved themselves most worthy to uphold the banner of Iowa by playing into the finals of both doubles and singles.

LAST year it seemed very doubtful for several months whether the University would put out a baseball team or not, owing to lack of funds with which to support one. This difficulty was finally overcome by the issue of season tickets to the games scheduled for the home field, which brought in more than enough for needs. Financial support insured, the team began practice with the opening of fair weather. A large number of candidates came out to try for the team, but among them only a few of the old men. The battery was composed of entirely new material, which would have been most discouraging if it had not been for the ability of the men who eventually filled the box. The other positions were filled with less difficulty and Coach Williams soon had his team in good running order.

The usual practice games with the Rock Island League were played the latter part of April and proved quite satisfactory to the supporters of the Old Gold.

The first college game was played at Grinnell resulting 8 to 4 in our favor, then the State Normal was defeated by a somewhat better score and everything bade fair for a winning team. But on May first a crack team came down from Knox and nearly administered us a shut out. From that day our fortunes seemed to be on the decline.

The eastern trip resulted in a long list of victories—for the opponents. However the team came home playing in much better form than when they left and demonstrated this fact in the second Minnesota game where the score stood 3 to 3 until the tenth inning, when the opponents scored their winning run.

The state league games left matters somewhat complicated. Grinnell defeated Ames, Ames defeated Iowa, and Iowa defeated Grinnell. This caused a three-cornered tie for possession of the silver bat, Cornell's percentage being lower than any of the other teams.

Arrangements were made to play off the tie, Grinnell defeated Ames a second time and Iowa failing to meet either of the others because of the lateness of the season, yielded up the bat to Grinnell.

Altogether the season brought out many good results. The financial returns for the year were quite satisfactory to the management but what is more essential, the need of more candidates for the team was emphasized and some players of more than ordinary ability were discovered in the inter-fraternity and inter-society games.

The Pan-Hellenic games, especially, were a notable feature of last springs sports and probably did more than anything else to heighten interest in the work of the Varsity.

The CROSS COUNTRY CLUB

OUR Cross Country Club finds its excuse for existence in the opportunity given for exercise to the large number of men who would otherwise be unoccupied in the fall, and in the developing and discovering of middle and long distance men. The brief history of cross-country running at Iowa is merely a repetition of a similar history at other institutions; many good men whose light had hitherto been concealed under a bushel came out the more willingly thinking that their supposed mediocrity would be less conspicuous owing to the large number of competitors.

Early in October, 1902, the first attempt was made and a committee consisting of Messrs. Brackett, Barker, Bush, Eastman and Captain Anderson was appointed to arrange for a series of runs. To the efforts of the members of this committee, who themselves had little personal interest in the competition runs, is due the credit for whatever success the Cross Country Club attained last fall. The practice runs developed from easy jogs of two miles to stiff jaunts of five or six miles and hare and hound runs of eight miles. Schenck, Drake and Gordon tried long distance work for the first time last fall, but are among the leaders in the competition for the individual prizes. The Liberal Arts Freshmen with Crossan, Moore, Tupper, Stearns and Weinrich have made an unusually good showing.

The postponement of the fifth competition run until April on account of the early snow in December leaves the result of the struggle for the inter-class cup in doubt. At present, Liberal Arts '06 has a lead of 23 points over Liberal Arts '05 on the first four runs.

Little Stories of Married Life

BY MRS. H. M. P.

It is so good and fresh and sweet and pure and appealing to all that is best in the heart of man and woman that we wish we might insure its entrance into every home in the land.—The Daily Iowan.

Confessions of a Cigarette Eater

BY SAM T. SLOAN

In this book written after the style of De Quincy, the author endeavors to prove that cigarettes are not only not injurious but positively beneficial. The author points to his own career as an example. We recommend this book to the student body and its effect cannot but be beneficial to those addicted to cigarettes. A preface by Prof. Sims is a valuable addition to this work.

My Library Courtship & A Society Romance....

This clever story from the pen of Charles T. Kemmerer is now on sale after being unanimously rejected by the annual board. It is beautifully illustrated and is the result of extended study and experience by the author. The hero, Harris Bush French, is easily seen to be the irresistible C. T. himself. The scene is laid in the library and the leading characters may be recognized as real people. While this is not the authors first attempt it is one of the best ever seen on any library table.

How to Crack Jokes

BY W. C. WILCOX

In this the author gives to the world his secrets of success. He explains his perennial almanac joke cracking system and shows how easy it is to dust off old material and launch it anew. He admits that his greatest successes have been with audiences who realized that a loud laugh might mean a high mark and vice-versa, but declares that his system has been inflicted on perfect strangers and they were so impressed with the age of the material that tears were in their eyes. All newsdealers—5c.

DANCING AS A FINE ART

BY HENRY FREDERICK WICKHAM

THIS supplies a deficiency that has long existed in American letters. The author explains clearly and definitely the relation of dancing to the art of professing. He shows that dancers are born, not made, that all great dancers are not stage beauties and that great personal attractiveness is likely to prove a detriment to a great dancer. This book is beautifully illustrated with half tones of the author in characteristic poses and contains a magnificent colored plate of a dancing beetle, thus proving the author's theory that dancing is a natural habit inherited from man's early ancestors. Cloth, 12mo—net $1.39.

Class Politics & Their Ins and Outs (Especially the Outs)

BY LYMAN DANIEL BEDFORD

IN this the author relates for the first time the story of the gallant struggle for the control of the Hawkeye board. It is related with the characteristic vim of the author but owing to his inherent modesty, he neglects to give himself due credit for the smash-up of his political machine. This book is recommended to succeeding classes for information about what not to do.

"WHY I AM GREAT"

BY COL. G. R. BURNETT

..... This is the book we have been looking for. As an example of bombastic bluster its equal has never been known. The author's various attempts to run the universe are clearly explained and his lack of success skillfully excused. As a study in adjectives and the use of the first person it is unsurpassed and its value as a historical work will doubtless be appreciated.

Price, at all newsdealers—11 cents.

A FEW THOUGHTS    §    §    §

BY PROF. BENJAMIN F. SHAMBAUGH

Many of the professor's latest thoughts are found in this edition, the chapter headings showing the scope of the work:

Chap. I    That is to Say.

Chap. II    In Other Words.

Chap. III    I. E., Par Excellence.

These books are bound in red, white and blue leather, the cover design being an Indian rampant on a mass of Iowa documents.

Stories of.... Thoroughbreds

BY CLARENCE ADDISON DYKSTRA

Either you have never read any of Mr. Dykstra's stirring "pony" stories or you are hard to please, if you do not jump at this chance to read a collection of tales of the exciting experiences of the author while riding the "pony" express through exams. Some of them are thrilling especially when the author on a small but sturdy "pony" gallantly carries a fair companion through a fierce encounter with a pre-historic Prof. The appendix contains explicit directions for the manufacture, care and successful use of ponies and in itself worth the price of the book to any student.

Cloth, 2mo—27c.

The Art of : : : Public Speaking

BY ISAAC A. LOOS

.... A handbook on the art of public speaking by the greatest living authority and one who has done more towards perfecting the system of gestures used in public speaking than any other living man. It is written in the fluent style for which the author's discourses are noted and like his public appearance commands immediate attention. The author's characteristic ping pong attitude is well shown in the reproductions from photographs taken expressly for this work. The great merit of this system lies in the fact that it gives time for the concentration of thought while it attracts the attention of the audience.

It has been adopted by the department of public speaking of the University of Iowa and bids fair to take a place with "Tom Sawyer" and the other famous masterpieces.

Paper covers—18c.

How to Detect Professionalism

BY ELMER A. WILCOX

In this the author reveals his famous system for the detection of professionalism among athletes. This system first attained prominence at the University of Iowa where its admirable results were shown in last year's athletics. The author shows how easy it is to detect professionalism among athletes and declares that any athlete can be proven a professional by the proper use of the I X L system. He claims that patient questioning is an excellent method for getting at the truth and relates several of his experiences. In one case the man examined seemed to be a simon pure amateur but at the end of four hours constant questioning he finally admitted having once received a nickle from his father for a quick trip to the post office. In another case the application of his system proved the so-called amateur a professional, for it developed that he had once carried water at a country field meet when seven years of age.

"We take pleasure in recommending this work by Prof. Wilcox, as it coincides exactly with our ideas of athletics and suggest that it be used in the other big nine universities."—(Drake) Delphic.

IRIS : A FANCY

By K. D. STEERE

With Illustrations by Anna W. Felkner

SMITHY leaned back contentedly on one of the iron benches which the Board of Control had placed on the campus that year, and, having finished the first chapter of his book, proceeded to take a casual glance at the ever changing group around the bulletin board; from thence his eyes gradually wandered to the little red brick church across the way, and down the long length of Clinton St.

"Pretty bum opera house!" he said to himself, as he chanced to look at this bit of mediæval architecture. "'Taint near as good as the one we've got * * *.'" Yes, my astute reader, Smithy was a Freshman.

He was not, however, excessively a Freshman; his clothes fitted him nicely it is true, and he wore shiny patent leather shoes and a white collar faced with a neat tie; but all these little failings could be overcome in time, for Smithy was a Collegiate Freshman. If he had been a medic, there would have been no help for him.

SMITHY

He had an open guileless look that took well with strangers, caused, no doubt, by two questioning, blue eyes and an engaging smile. His brown hair as occasion always showed, was parted precisely in the middle, and on his upper lip the faintest suspicion of future glory maintained an uncertain existence.

Having delivered himself of that sage reflection concerning Iowa City's classic playhouse, he promptly dismissed the subject from his mind, after the manner of all great men and with half closed eyes dropped off into a day dream which had for a background swaying tree tops with leaves fast turning red and golden, and a squirrel, seeming very small in the distance, revelling in the warm south wind.

With a prophetic eye he beheld the Class of '07 marching onward to a triumphant graduation, the pride of the University, the wonder of the world, and he himself, champion debater, Captain of the Team — — —

"Freshie!"

Smithy came to with a jerk and stared in astonishment at the trim girlish figure at the other end of the bench.

"Beg pardon," he said.

"Freshie," and leaning one arm on the back of the seat, she regarded him somewhat in the manner Prof. Nutting might inspect a rare doodadolorum.

She was perhaps nineteen, but like all girls at that age, she seemed older; her dress was light and becoming, of what material, what mere man could tell; a dainty hat in blue and white added decidedly to the effect, as did two twinkling brown eyes and a small, red mouth puckered into the faintest suspicion of a smile.

"Are you crazy?" he questioned.

She laughed merrily at his speech.

"Of course not" she said "One is always permitted to speak to famous men on sight, you know."

"What do you mean?"

"Oh you needn't be astonished, I knew you as soon as I saw you."

"You talk in riddles, Miss ——— Miss ———"

"MacLane."

"What?"

"MacLane, Mary MacLane."

"The dev—"

"Sir!"

"I beg your pardon,—purely an ejaculation."

"Certainly, Mr. Hubbard."

"Hubbard?"

"Aren't you Elbert Hubbard, Jr.? —Oh, horrors!"

And Smithy would have beheld a rapidly vanishing young lady had he not laid detaining hands upon her.

Mary MacLane, as she called herself, promptly buried her face in a marvelous bit of lace which was so dainty he had no trouble in perceiving the tears which coursed down two very pink cheeks.

"Don't," he implored, "Don't!"

What other man ever said more under similar conditions? James Arthur Smith was very human. The sobs continued unabated.

"You'll get the lace all mussy," was the next brilliant suggestion he offered. The owner of the lace, however, continued to remain in the seclusion it afforded. Smithy dug both hands deep into his pockets and whistled despondently; at length he made one more appeal.

"Your eyes will be a fright," he said, "and your hair — — —"

A succession of gurgles and gasps followed this announcement, and at length an eye, glistening with tears, surveyed the abominable Mr. Smith.

"Why didn't you let me go when I wanted to?" wailed the girl.

"Oh, I couldn't have you run off that way," said Smithy airily. "I want to learn your real name, and all that, you know."

"Never," said the girl desperately, and then as curiosity gradually got the better of her confusion, she added, "But really, aren't you?—the paper said—"

"The paper?" A great light dawned on Smithy.

"The Iowan."

"Well I'm—" and he slapped his knee in an ecstasy of mirth.

Mary MacLane regarded him wonderingly.

"I don't see," she began.

"I met a fellow on the train—egotistical devil—told him a lovely story—he—he must have believed it"—he replied between sobs of laughter.

"You—you lied."

James Arthur Smith turned and looked curiously at the girl beside him.

"It's fun," he said, and they both laughed.

"That makes it easier," he began,

"no harm done, and I have found a delightful acquaintance."

"Have you?"

"I am sure of it. A beautiful girl is always a delightful acquaintance."

"Out on you for a flatter!"

"Aren't you a girl?"

"Are you a boy?"

"Oui, Mademoiselle."

"You are a Freshman."

"Do I look it?"

"Ye-es. But you'll get over it."

"Thanks, awfully. And you?"

"And I?"

"Yes—it's your turn."

"What would you know?"

"May I question?"

"Certainly. But I shall not answer everything."

"That spoils the fun."

"Why should I answer at all? You had best be satisfied with half a loaf, Monsieur."

"Well, if I must, I must. But you will at least answer truthfully?"

"If I answer at all. But hurry—what would people say if they saw me talking to an unknown Freshman?"

"Oh, I'm not offended.—Now tell me your—real name?"

"No," emphatically.

"Oh, but I must call you something."

"As you please," she replied indifferently.

"Suppose it were—Iris. The rainbow in your eye suggests that, little Iris."

"Do you want me to leave at once?" she demanded from behind the bit of lace."

"Oh, that's not fair," he replied indignantly. "You shouldn't hide your face that way, you know."

"Will you stop it?"

A gentle voice by the fountain whispered "Yes."

"Stop what?"

"Will you stop it?"

"Ye-es. But—"

"Now remember," she said warningly, and the lace went into her lap again.

"May I meet you again?"

Iris smiled in his face tantalizingly.

"If you can," she said, and before he had a chance to protest, she had risen and was hurrying across the campus. He watched her, as she disappeared within the open door of the Liberal Arts building.

The first term's work was nearly finished, and James Arthur Smith was wondering what kind fate would lighten the week's vacation. It was out of the question to go home two hundred miles or more, when he would make the same trip a few weeks later at Christmas. To be sure there was the library, and one could play ping-pong at Close Hall, but then one could always do that, and Smithy wanted something different.

"I can't call on the Wilsons more than once during the vacation," he thought, as standing within the Smoke House window, he watched the people pass by in an endless crowd. "I wish they would ask me to dinner. Goodness, but wouldn't I like to be home for a week."

Smithy had become acquainted with Mrs. Wilson at one of the house receptions early in the fall; he called, at her generous invitation, became very well acquainted with Col. Wilson and his son Jack, a boy in Smithy's own class, and had heard more or less of a daughter, Louise, a year older than Jack, who was taking her Sophomore work at the University of Chicago.

The Wilsons lived on North Clinton, in a house built well back from the street and surrounded by a spacious lawn. It was a two-story, red brick affair, built in the days when fancy design gave way to rooms of generous dimensions, and the chief ornaments were of sawed wood, clustering beneath the eaves like swallows nests.

When Col. Wilson had acquired the property some ten years before, he had added a small conservatory on the south, opening off from the spacious dining room. In this he took as much pride as his wife did in her reception rooms and parlors with their waxed floors, harmonious tints, and antique furniture. Smithy was indeed fortunate in such friends, and enjoyed his advantage to the utmost.

"If I could only find Iris" he continued. Iris, indeed! From the time he had watched her disappear in the north door of the Liberal Arts building, not a single glimpse had he been granted of that enchanted girl. Cautious inquiries led to no better results; and even Jack Wilson, who had lived in Iowa City the better part of his life, could tell him nothing.

Smithy was more disappointed by these continued failures than he cared to admit. The girl had affected him strangely, and even though he had seen her but the one time, he thought of her more than is good for a boy of nineteen.

So the fall had passed quickly away and in spite of all, Iris was still his mystery; that he would meet her again he had never doubted, but now—he despaired.

When he finally went home that morning, he found a small blue envelope which he inspected in amazement; the writing was in a strange hand; it was postmarked Iowa City. His astonishment changed to delight and then wonder as he read the following:

DEAR MR. SMITH:—

As I understand you are not going home Thanksgiving, do you not wish to be one of a house party during the holidays? There will be some friends of Jack's and some older University people whom I am sure you will be glad to meet. Come over Thursday afternoon and be prepared to stay till Monday morning.

Iris will be one of the party.

MRS. WILSON.

"Iris one of the party!" Smithy looked again to be sure that he was not dreaming. What could it mean? and how could Mrs. Wilson know anything of that affair? He smiled vacantly out of the window at the drifting snow, which an arrant north wind curled with startling fierceness. Again he was sitting in the park, his mind lost in the old gold tree tops, playing tag with a squirrel; and again he heard the startling word,

"Freshie!"

Would he go? He started toward the closet for his suit case and then stopped, remembering that it was only the middle of the week.

"I've gone daffy over a girl!" said Smithy, and laughed.

He made haste to drop a note to Mrs. Wilson, accepting, but whether she expected it or not, he said nothing of Iris. Neither did he see Jack that night nor the next day, though he spent the most of his time where Jack would most likely be in case he was down town. So the time passed till at length Smithy, no wiser as to who his companions would be or concerning the mysterious Iris, left his room on Fairchild, suit-case in hand, and hurried over to Clinton street.

Now that the end of the mystery as he called it, was approaching, it was with a trembling hand that he rang the bell of Col. Wilson's residence, but at the first smothered tinkle, this feeling vanished, and it was the same old Smithy, alert, smiling, confident, whom Jack met in the hall.

"Glad you could come," said the boy, shaking his hand warmly. "We'll have a jolly time."

They turned and walked up the broad stairs together.

"This is a most welcome surprise," said Smithy as he laid his suit-case on the bed preparatory to unlocking it, "and I'll bet it's all your planning, Jack."

"Not guilty," said the boy smiling.

"All right, I am not convinced though. Where shall I put this stuff?"

"Here in the dresser."

This being speedily accomplished, the two boys talked together for a few minutes, when Jack arose with an exclamation and hurried toward the door.

"I forgot something that mother wanted," he said, turning for a moment on the threshold. "You go down to the conservatory and amuse yourself. I'll be gone an hour or more."

Smithy could hear his echoing footsteps as he rushed down the stairs.

"He doesn't know," he said thoughtfully, and arose to follow.

The hall below was deserted, as were the parlor and library through which he passed hastily. Through the glass door of the greenhouse, a profusion of color greeted him. As he opened it, the hot, sticky smell of the growing plants seemed at first oppressive, but further in the air was cooler. Here a little arbor with climbing vines and lattice work had been built before a tiny fountain, whose waters fell with a musical murmur upon the rocks beneath. A broad lounging seat had been placed within; several thick rugs hid the floor; some pillows, covered in green and orange, lay scattered about; and on a wicker bench at one side, a jar of tobacco and some pipes were half hidden beneath a pile of papers and magazines.

He picked up one of the pipes, a heavy, black, English bulldog, with a great bowl fancifully carved, and the rim blackened and burned by usage. He filled it from the jar, lifting the rich Virginia leaf with his thumb and fore-finger; it was soft to the touch, and the odor delighted Smithy's heart.

After arranging the pillows to his fancy and lighting the pipe, he leaned back with a sigh of contentment, and sending a ring of smoke circling into the air followed it lazily with his eyes. Thoughts disjointed as the curling smoke, sweet as the music of the fountain, drifted sluggishly through his mind.

What should he say to Iris when he met her again? Would she remember him yet? Certainly—and yet—and yet—of course she would—Iris—what a pretty name—what a pretty—

Of Iris only were his thoughts, and the song of the fountain blended gently with them. He fancied he could see her face in the smoke cloud just over his head; the flushed cheeks, the brown hair, the twinkling eyes, just as he had known her that September afternoon, which now seemed so long ago.

"Iris", he whispered softly. "Iris."

And a gentle voice by the fountain, answered "Yes."

"Iris," he cried, half rising, and the pipe which he held in his hand, dropped without a sound on the thick rug at his feet. The girl standing a few feet away, smiled into his face. She wore something white and fleecy—a house dress, perhaps—with a wide sailor collar, and many folds; her neck was bare; a single rose, pinned on her breast, lent a bit of color. In all else she was the Iris of old, more beautiful than ever.

Wonderingly he watched her sit down on the rugs beside him, and placing a pillow at her back, lean against the lattice wall.

"You may smoke," she said, "I like the smoke of good tobacco."

As in a dream he recovered the fallen pipe, and again lay back on the couch; by turning his head ever so slightly, he could see her face, white as marble, outlined against the green foliage.

"I—had given you up," he began happily.

"I came," she replied simply.

"I have so much to say," he continued, "And so little—I can say. You are still my mystery, Iris, I am not sure but that this is all a dream. It could very possibly be a dream," he went on as she shook her head smiling. "What could be more natural? I come in here, a little tired, and lie down on the couch thinking of—Iris. I go to sleep, thinking of Iris, and ergo, I dream that she is here. I have convinced myself that I am asleep and must have tangible proof to the contrary."

In an instant Smithy had a warm little hand imprisoned in his big one; the hand objected strenuously.

"Suppose some one should come in," said the girl.

"Suppose," said Smithy calmly.

"Aren't you convinced now" said the girl, and the hand exhibited further symptoms of nervousness.

But he did not answer; the glad light of fancy lit his face.

"Iris," he said, "Why wouldn't you let me know before that you were Jack's sister?"

Her hand was free. Smithy, half turning on the lounge, could see only the brown head bent.

"I was afraid," she said softly.

"Afraid?" he questioned.

But she would not answer, and then—he knew.

"May I come in," said a voice at the other end of the green-house. Mrs. Wilson was walking down the aisle between the flowers.

You surely must have noticed
If you notice things at all,
That the library is crowded
And a crowd is in the hall.
Some "study" all the morning,
Some "study" all the day,
And there are some of them, it seems,
Who never go away.

Now what is the attraction
Which brings them all up there?
It surely can't be study,
For that, in spring, is rare.
Upon investigation,
We have found—it may be guessed—
That the objects being studied
Are those orbs behind the desk.

The VILLAGE DRUGGIST

WITHIN his corner store-room bright
The village druggist stands,
With thread-bare coat, re-seated pants,
And thin and bony hands;
And the bottles on the shelves arrayed,
Are gilt with golden bands.

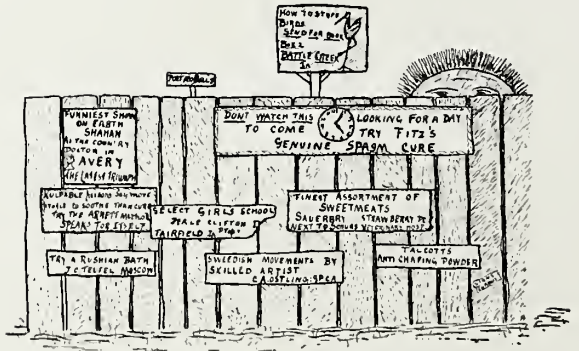

With hungry eye and famished look
He gazeth towards the door,
Longing for some customer
Who will increase the store
Of nickles in his money-drawer,
At least one nickel more.

His hair is thin and gray and short,
His face is pinched and wan;
Thought sits enthroned upon his brow;
He sells whate'er he can
And stares the whole world in the face,
For he's a hard-up man.

Week in, week out, from morn till night,
You see him standing there,
You hear him sigh his heavy sighs,
The measures of despair;
Lack-lustre eye and shrunken form,
All tell of want and care.

Toiling, sorrowing, suffering,
Onward through life he goes;
Each morning sees the same old grind,
Each eve, increasing woes;
Till finally he shuts up shop,
And finds at last, repose.

LIBERAL ARTS CORRIDOR

IOWA CITY, Feb. 1, 1903

DEAR FATHER:—I have your favor of recent date with the enclosure and will say in regard to it that the decimal point in the figures was in the wrong place. Consequently if I pay my tuition for the second semester I will have to have about $50.00 more. I know expenses are high here, but I've cut out cigars and smoke a pipe now and that will help some.

I am sending you a picture of our class and you can draw your own conclusions. Your verdict, however, may be overruled. We had several more last year but the exam. in Contracts sort of separated the sheep from the goats, determined the survival of the fittest, etc., etc. I'll mention right here that Dean Gregory gave the examination.

I have just finished the end of the semester's examinations and if they pass me up I'll have my measure taken for the harness of a Supreme Court Judge.

Here are a few of the questions they handed us. They'll hand us each a letter of the alphabet in a few days. If you can answer these you're a candidate for an L. L. D.

"How long is the Hear Say rule?"

"How many small botts in a case?"

"Is it a presumption of law or fact that all jurors are damphools?"

"Would it be slanderous to say Mercer had bats in his belfry?"

"Can you enjoin a man from running a whizzer in a poker game? (Explain in full)."

"Could you recover damages from the Board of Regents for the way Sammy teaches Real Property?"

"If a hot box on a stock car turned the hogs into lard would you have an action against the R. R. Co. for arson?"

I can't begin to tell you all of the good points of all the men of our class but there are a few extremely bright lights that I feel you should know.

There's Col. Burnett, U. S. A., who is sort of the father of the class. Law with him is quite a joke—as he is with us. He has medals enough to ballast a ship and belongs to every organization in this country and Germany that has a ritual. He is also very fond of dachshunds and tin soldiers.

Roy A. Cook is the only real literary man in the University and we feel very proud to possess him. He writes for the "Black Cat" and "Diamond Dick" and "The Saturday Blade." You perhaps have seen his picture in these publications as "the poet lad from Iowa." He has a fighting chance to become a lawyer some day.

The man with the awfully dignified look is E. K. Brown. He took on the look shortly after winning the Northern Oratorical Contest last year and it hasn't worn off yet. I have it from him confidentially that he intends to run for J. P. of East Lucas Twp. in 1904.

Bob Law is the class cut-up and when he is feeling real keen he can give any of the great humorists cards and spades. His name sounds quite likely, but then, what's in a name?

Old Pard Irvine is paying his way through school by writing testimonials for Ivory Soap. He wore a new collar to class one morning and Prof. Richards took him for a visitor.

And there is Diamond—but he speaks for himself and usually loud enough for you to hear him clear down home.

We are trying Hamlet this week for the murder of Claudius some few hundred years ago. The state is represented by W. K. Herrick, M. Brackett and J. E. Cross. Judge Deemer has appointed A. A. Brown, S. D. Whiting and G. P. Linville to defend Hamlet. Sheriff Burnett has had charge of R. A. Cook (who represents Hamlet in the trial) and if things go smoothly will probably officiate at the hanging.

As soon as this case is disposed of we will try Cain for fratricide. But that will be another story.

Don't forget the fifty.

Your Affectionate Son,

A JUNIOR LAW.

A SOLILOQUY

---

Of course we are small in numbers and our doses are small, but our feet and feelings are abnormally large, and we and our doses are effective. We represent the followers of "similia similibus curantur" and altho our following here is comparatively small, we are rapidly gaining and have the satisfaction of knowing that we are advancing. There is no half-way about us and we are proud to be believers in the principles of Hahneman. As students of applied science, we are constantly able to prove that the law of similars is simply nature's own law which we aid by our remedies. Our cry has been and always will be, "Small doses of the indicated drug given at the correct time and in a proper manner will aid nature in resisting morbid actions." Study nature's laws and you will be with us.

Drs. Bywater and Kemp will write a book entitled "How to be happy tho' married."

Prof.: "What is the action of Cantharis?"

Ed. Bywater: "It produces an inflammation resulting in formation of 'mus' and 'pucus.' — — — I mean pus and mucous."

Soph-Medic: "What nerve supplies the motor branch of the teeth?"

Senior: "A branch of the fifth."

For the information of those who are not "medics" we will state that all teeth, except false ones, are immovable and do not need motor nerves.

H. L. Rowat, Homeop, has taken to raising frogs for the University laboratory and has applied for membership in the Hopgrowers Association.

Dr. Graves has a beautiful specimen of "corrugated" pulse.

OFFICIAL REPORT of MUSTACHES

---

Bywater: Killed by recent cold snap—will start again in spring.

Lintleman: Poor seed and drought makes thin crop—a dressing of pigeon milk is recommended.

Bond: Ripe and ready for cutting.

Holman: Good but is producing baldness by drawing nourishment from the scalp.

Sandy: Slightly sun-burned. He will dye.

Graves: Needs transplanting on account of infected soil.

Hand: Fairly good, but has taken all the strength from his vocal cords leaving a weak, squeaky voice.

Huff: Married, and most of his mustache has been extracted.

Prof. Royal: For what would you give Silicalic (Salicilic) acid.

The limit of Dr. Hand's social achievements up-to-date is having had appendicitis.

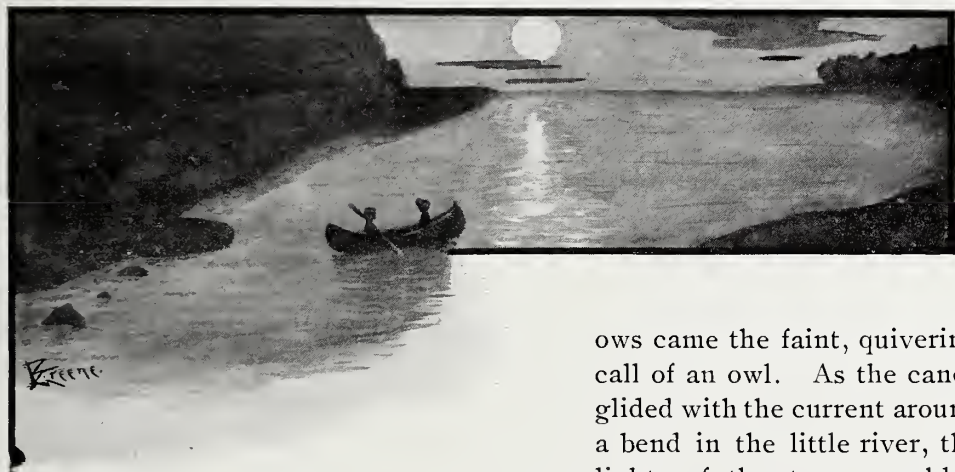

JUST PLAIN OLD BOOTS, M. '04

A TROUBLESOME ROOM-MATE

The SECOND TIME BY MOONLIGHT

By JOANNA STRANGE

ows came the faint, quivering call of an owl. As the canoe glided with the current around a bend in the little river, the lights of the town sparkled and twinkled in the distance, and the moon, for a moment, shone full on the boat.

In one end was the small trim figure of a girl in a white shirt waist and sailor hat. She sat primly erect in sharp contrast to the man opposite, her hands folded in her lap.

He was big and brown, his coat was off, his sleeves rolled up to his elbows; he wore no hat, and his thick brown hair was moist and ruffled. He was looking away to the dark shadows above the bend, his strong, clear-cut face silhouetted against the blackness.

It was late one moonlight night in June. A canoe with two figures in it glided slowly down the Iowa river. The trees on either side of the little stream showed black against the starlit sky, and through the leaves the moon sent long shafts of light across the rippling water. The distant roar of the dam sounded a low accompaniment to the chirp of the crickets, and from the moonlit shad-

At last he looked at the girl and smiled as he spoke: "It's a good thing you know me pretty well, Clarissa—you're used to my negligee. Your immaculate propriety is really appalling. I don't know how I dare risk your friendship by my carelessness. But it is so warm."

As he tucked his handkerchief around his neck the girl looked up at him, smiled slowly, and said in a neat little voice quite in harmony with her clothes, "You are somewhat careless, are you not, Clifford? But then it is your way. I am not like other girls. I don't like to be careless. I don't mind it so much in a man, but I do not like to see a girl with her hair flying and her sleeves rolled up. It isn't ladylike."

The man placed the paddle in the bottom of the canoe, sat back comfortably, his hands behind his head, and said, "School's most over."

"Yes," answered the girl, "I'm sorry. I've had a good time this year."

"I, too." And the man looked off again to the dark trees. "But I shall be glad to get to work and see what I can do. I hate to feel that I am through,—through the whole four years, and that I'm not coming back next year; and yet I shall be glad to work."

"I'm glad I have another year yet," answered the girl. "It will be fine to come back, and one's Senior year is always nice. Then

I have lots of work to do for the Clisophic debate next year, and other things—" she sighed a little. "It's nice to do things, but—"

The man sat up, put his paddle in the water and let it drag. He faced the girl again.

"Clarissa," he said, "We have been very good friends,—and I have something I want to tell you tonight."

The girl leaned forward a little. The man went on,

"We have been around together a good deal this spring, and you have been very kind to me, and I'm going to tell you something—"

"Oh! no," gasped Clarissa.

The man smiled at her, moving the paddle softly in the water.

"Yes, you have been very good to me, very. You girls are all fine, but some way you seem to understand me better than most of them, Clarissa, and I want you to know tonight that there is something that has meant a lot to me this year—"

The girl leaned forward, gripping the sides of the canoe.

"Stop, Clifford; I can't let you go on any further. I'm so sorry it has come to this."

"But, listen, Clarissa," he interrupted.

"No, don't, please, because I understand. I was afraid you were going to care, but some way we always were just friends, and good friends, and I let you go on without thinking.

I—” She talked fast. “I’m so sorry, Clifford. I don’t think I am the kind of a girl to let a man go so far when I couldn’t love him, but I was thoughtless. I have always despised girls who broke men’s hearts just for the mere fun of it, or the thoughtlessness of it.”

She could not see the man’s face, for he had paddled the canoe into the shadow along the bank, but he was sitting quite still, his hands gripping the paddle which was across the boat in front of him.

She went on, “It’s my fault, I should have seen that you were caring,—and stopped it. I’m so sorry. I like you so much, Clifford—but I really couldn’t love you. I couldn’t. I couldn’t marry you, Clifford,” she said imploringly.

The man coughed and choked a little.

“Does it hurt as bad as that?” she said softly, locking her fingers together in her lap and leaning forward. “I’m so sorry. It really seems to me it would be almost easier to accept a man than to refuse him, even if you didn’t love him,” she said, half to herself.

“No,” said Clifford, sharply, his voice strained.

“How good you are to feel so about it,” she said after a minute. “Almost any other man would be so selfish as to want a girl anyway. It’s very sweet of you,” tearfully, “I wish I did love you.”

The man put the paddle in the water and the canoe glided toward the boathouse, the lights coming nearer and nearer, the roar of the lower dam sounding louder.

The girl looked at the man’s face as the moonlight struck it. He was staring over her head, his eyes on the shore, and his lower lip held tightly between his teeth.

They reached the boathouse; the man put on his coat and cap, helped the girl out of the boat, paid the boatman, and then the two started toward town. They walked in silence for some time; the man’s brow was knit, and his lip still between his teeth. After some time the girl put her hand on his arm, and looking up at him, said softly,

“I hope you won’t let this spoil your life, Clifford, and I hope you won’t think that I have led you on. I can’t stand it to feel that I have spoiled any man’s life.” After a pause, “You really will get over it, I’m sure. That sounds hard, I know, but you’ll try to get over it, won’t you?” imploringly.

She could not see his face now, and she did not give him time to answer, but went on,

“I never would have thought that you cared in this way. I might have seen it, I suppose, but I didn’t. I’ve always been so careful to stop things like this in time, and I should have seen.”

The man choked.

She stopped and they walked the rest of the way in silence, only the man's slow, repressed breathing breaking the stillness.

When they reached her home, they stood on the porch a moment. Clarissa held out her hand. The man took it carefully, turning his head away from the light on the corner.

The girl pressed his big hand in both of hers.

get over it,—she thinks I'll get over it,—and I never — — — had it!!”

Two days later, Bob Mulford, Clifford's roommate, dashed up the stairs three steps at a time, into his room, and slammed the door with a bang.

“A little box and a blue letter for you, Cliff. Here they are. What you got in the box?”

He tossed them across to the young

“Don't let it break your heart, I beg of you, Clifford. I wish I could love you, but I don't. I'm so sorry. Good night.”

“Good night,” said Clifford, his voice strained.

The door closed on her. The man stood for a moment, his hands in his pockets. Then, turning, he strode down the street, muttering, “Well, I'll be hanged!—And she thinks I'll fellow lounging in the Morris chair near the window, sat down on the bed, tearing open a couple of envelopes, and then, after glancing at the slips of paper in them, dropped them on the floor. “Nothing but duns,—all the ‘blue letters’ I seem likely to receive,” he growled, watching Clifford as he carefully opened his letter. “Well, you needn't try not to look happy, old man,” he said kindly, "I happen to know who it's from, having roomed with you 'most a year, and I'll make allowances for your youth, if you do forget yourself and bubble over. I—"

"The devil!" interrupted Clifford, jumping up and looking wildly around. "Great Heavens! Bob," he said, jamming the letter into his pocket, and hurling himself into the closet. "Oh, I say, Bob, help me, can't you, you idiot? For goodness sake, tell me how much time I've got before that 5:30 train to Roscoe." He emerged with one slipper and a shoe, and dragging his coat by one arm.

"Hi, there! What are you doing with my slippers?" said Bob. "Are you crazy, man?"

Clifford fired the slipper at Bob, who dodged.

"Can't you help a fellow, now? Brush that coat there and get me a collar. Hurry! I've got fifteen minutes to catch that train."

Bob began to work, a mystified look on his face.

"Must be something pretty bad," he said. "Never went to Kitty this way before. Too bad her mother's sick so she can't come up to commencement, isn't it? Coming back tonight?" he asked coolly. "You're star actor in the class play, remember, and tomorrow's the last rehearsal."

"Oh, hang it! I suppose I'll have to. Here, give me that blue tie."

"You didn't tell me what you got in your box," Bob continued calmly.

"Don't know. Look and see, if it will keep you still," tugging at his tie.

Bob cut the string, opened the box, and started back.

"Gee! Who likes you so well as all that, I wonder! Sending you diamonds! Gee whiz!"

Clifford looked, grew perfectly white, and sat down on the bed.

"The devil, man! Wha'ts up?" exclaimed Bob, anxiously.

"Here give it to me!" and thrusting the ring into his vest pocket, Clifford picked up a Turkish fez which happened to be on the couch and rushed down stairs.

"Cliff,—you fool! You aren't going to wear that hat, are you? Here, take this, and remember that it goes on your head and not on your feet!" yelled Bob from the top of the stairs, throwing a fedora after him.

With the fedora in his hand, Clifford ran down the street, reaching the little station just in time to swing on to the last car of the moving train.

The two hours to Roscoe were endless. Clifford walked from smoker to parlor-car and back — tried each empty seat in every car — read a Chicago paper up side down — and fingered something in his vest pocket. More than once he stepped on the platform and read over the blue tinted note—much to the amusement of a group of girls who could see him from where they sat.

At Beverly, where the train stopped for supper, Clifford paced back and forth on the platform.

"What is the matter with that young man?" asked a kind faced old lady eating her lunch from a paper bag, as she leaned over to offer the young woman in the seat in front of her a "home-made doughnut."

"I'm sure I don't know," answered the girl, smiling as she accepted it. "I've been wondering myself. He seems to be worried about something."

"Maybe he's sick. He looks so white," said the old woman.

"More likely he's in love," replied the girl, lightly.

The train started and Clifford got on and sat down in a corner and pulled his hat over his eyes.

"Poor boy," said the old lady under her breath.

Just before the train steamed into Roscoe, Clifford got up, buttoned his coat, and went to the platform. As the train reached the station he jumped off, stopped a moment to look at his watch, muttering "7:35 — Guess I'll go right up."

He stopped before a low vine covered house and looked at his watch again. He wiped his face, then stepped on the porch and rang the bell.

"Miss Kendall," he said to the maid, "I wish to see her." He took a card and wrote under his name—"I must see you for a few minutes," gave it to the maid, who opened the door into the library.

Clifford sat down in a great arm chair by a vine-covered window, put his hat on the floor and waited.

There was one chance in fifty that she'd see him. He'd be hanged if he would if he were she—and there was one chance in fifty that she'd understand after he'd explained—if she did see him —.

The door opened and a tall, slender girl walked slowly into the room. She was dressed in a loose white gown, with a little sweep, which made her look even more stately. She was beautiful; she held her head in the air, her dark eyes were even more dark for the heavy shadows under them, and her brown hair was piled high on her head; her face was pale.

The man rose quickly, stepped toward her, and said gently, "You are very good to see me, Katherine. I don't know whether I can explain to you so you can understand me. You are good—awfully good to see me. It's more than I had hoped for."

She did not speak at first, then in a low, measured voice she said, looking him squarely in the eyes,

"I don't see how you dare to come near me!"

She took a long-stemmed carnation from a vase on the table and twirled it in her slender fingers.

The man pressed his hand hard over his eyes and said,

"Katherine, you have loved me and trusted me, haven't you?"

"I have been so foolish," she answered, icily.

"Well, for the sake of the love and trust you have had in me—even though it was foolish—you will allow me to explain, or try to,—will you?" He talked slowly.

The girl looked at him, contempt in every line of her face and figure.

"To explain?" she said scathingly. "To explain?—O! it isn't necessary at all,—believe me. The letter I received yesterday from Clarissa Wilmot explains everything very nicely. It was nice of Clarissa to write me about it, not knowing that I was at all interested, or that I ever knew you,—she was perfectly innocent; but, as I say, it was nice of her."

She broke the stem of the carnation and rolled the two stalks together between her fingers, speaking quietly, still looking the man squarely in the eyes.

"And nice for me to hear it all that way, too, since it spared me the agony of any doubt in the matter, having it come straight from headquarters, you know.

"Clarissa is a dear little girl. She used to live here, you know; I've known her always. You are indeed to be congratulated on your taste. She wrote me all about how you felt about it;—how you couldn't speak for fear of breaking down, and how badly she felt for you. It was so nice of you to think of the river for the background—and a moonlight night—almost exactly one year from another river and another moonlight night. The delicacy of it was beautiful, I thought."

She put her hand on the edge of the table and he noticed how it trembled. He twisted a button from his coat, and it fell to the hard wood floor with a vicious little click that made him jump.

She trailed the carnation across her lips.

"My only comfort is that I have not announced our engagement to a soul. The ring I have worn—around my neck, since it came last week—waiting till the year was up to announce it. So, I still have my self respect left,—as far as that is concerned. It doesn't matter really,—but my pride is very great."

She held her head proudly and her eyes flashed.

"I have a few letters and things which I shall return to you very soon." She swayed slightly; her hand clutched the table. "And you will understand that I do not —" She faltered, and Clifford stepped to her side, took her gently in his arms and placed her in a big chair. Then, going to the table in the corner of the room, he poured her some water and held it to her lips.

She drank, and leaned her head back, her eyes closed. Clifford sat down on a low stool near her and watched the faint color come back to her face, his own face drawn and haggard. Then he took both her hands in his, and said, softly but firmly,

"Katherine, I'm going to talk to you now, and you are going to listen. We are not going to be unhappy because of a misunderstanding." She made an effort to draw her hands away and rise, but he held her there. "No, sit still, dear. You must listen,—it's only fair.

"It is a question of whether you are going to believe most in Clarissa Wilmot, or me,—and you have always believed in me up to now,—so I'm going to assume that you are going to again.

"Now I can see how Clarissa Wilmot is perfectly sincere in what she says when she writes that I proposed to her, but I am also just as sincere when I tell you that I did not propose to her. I did not propose to Clarissa Wilmot, Katherine, nor have I ever had any intention of such a thing."

Katherine looked into the man's honest blue eyes—and shut her own. Then she said, languidly,

"But she wrote me the very next day after it happened,—the very next day,—and Clarissa never makes jokes. She's not that kind;—anyway, she didn't know that I knew you, unless you told her." She sighed.

"No, I never told her," said the man. "But I'm going to tell you all about it."

"But you just said there was nothing to it." Katherine sat up very straight; her eyes snapped. "I wish you'd go away.—I hate you," she said, two big tears forcing themselves to her eyes in spite of her efforts to keep them back.

Clifford took her hands again and said, very firmly,

"No,—I'm not going away and you do not hate me, and you are not going to, either. You shall listen to me for a few minutes, and then, if you do not believe me, I'll go away and let you alone.

"You know, I've been around with lots of the university girls year, more or less;—I've told you all about it, —and I've been with Clarissa a good deal because I've known her a good while and we get along fairly well. Well, Clarissa is a good little thing and has been nice to me, in her way, and has helped me fill up lots of hours when I wanted you and you weren't there,—so I have felt her a very good friend.

"Well, since this is so, and since I've known her a good while, and since my mind was so full of you that night that I couldn't help it, and since we were to announce our engagement next week, anyway, I'd thought I'd tell her about it, thinking, of course, that she would be glad with me and for me. I don't know how I went about it, I'm sure, —we were on the river, as she wrote you,—but the first thing I knew she was telling me to stop, — that she didn't care for me, and she was so sorry, and a lot of things like that. I was dumbfounded, of course, when felt so sorry for me, — hoped I wouldn't feel badly, — wished she could love me! She meant it all right, only she was a little premature, —so I didn't say anything, but let her talk. I suppose it would have been more manly, perhaps, under the circumstances, to have told her exactly what I meant,—but she jumped right in from the start and took it all so for granted, and I knew she

I found that she thought I was asking her to love me. Gee! It was a deuce of a position to be in. I couldn't tell the girl after she'd refused me, and so forth, that I hadn't asked her, —very well,—and I rather objected to being a broken-hearted, dejected lover, when all I wanted was congratulations;—but what could I do? I wouldn't hurt Clarissa for anything. She was perfectly sincere in it all,— didn't gossip much, so I thought I wouldn't hurt her. She never would have gotten over it, you know."

He raised her hand to his lips and pressed it there. She was looking at him, a bright spot in either cheek.

He went on.

"It would have been more fair to you, of course, to have told her, but I thought you'd understand, when I told you, and see it as I did."

It has grown dark in the library; the faint light of the moon shone through the vines over the window.

"What did you say when she refused you? Poor little Clarissa!" She added softly.

"Say?" said the man, "I didn't say anything. I kept my face in the shadow. She said, I—"

The girl broke into a hysterical laugh.

"O—I think it's the funniest thing I ever heard," she said. "The very funniest. You,—and Clarissa,—the moonlight, and the refusal! It's too funny." She laughed till she cried.

He sighed a little and said, when she stopped to wipe her eyes,

"I swore by all the gods I'd never tell a soul but you, and I never shall. I never thought of Clarissa's telling. It was a deuce of a scrape; but I did feel sorry for the girl. Do you understand, dear?"

Katherine's laugh rippled, again and again.

"O, you poor, dear boy. It certainly is the worst scrape anyone ever got into. It was hard for me, — but — " She stopped a moment. "But it would kill Clarissa to know. You are a much bigger man than I ever thought you, Clifford."

The moon went under a cloud and the room became dark again.

Half an hour later they stood on the porch.

"I've got to take that eleven o'clock train, Kitty," he said. "Tomorrow's the last class play practice and I must be there. O, I wish you could come up for the week, dear."

"Yes, I'd like to, but mother can't be left, and besides, there's Clarissa, and it wouldn't do, hardly,— Clifford stepped down a couple of steps. Katherine stood, in her white gown, above him. He took something from his vest pocket and put it on her finger.

"You'll wear it, dear? Please. We won't announce it, really, till fall,—on Clarissa's account, as you say. Dear little woman, to think of that," he said, tenderly. "But you'll wear the ring, dear?"

He looked up at her and stepped back up the two steps. They stood silently for a few moments, watching the moon through the clouds. Then Katherine's head slowly leaned against Clifford's broad shoulder; and she sighed happily, and said,

"Yes, I'll wear it if you want me to." Then, with a little happy laugh, "O, Cliff, — but suppose she had accepted you."

Friend: "What did Dr. B. call your complaint."

Law (with gusto): "Belladonna."

Dr. Littig thinks he is "the only pebble on the beach" since St.

dandy, and for a youngster of its age, it can make a great uproar.

Dr. Guthrie is an ardent admirer of Miss Safely. He has been known to stop at least twice in one lecture and fiercely scowl at young men who have had the nerve to try to attract her attention.

Dr. Nervig during clinic suddenly remembers a rip in his trousers—
(one which had been there the day before, at any rate)—he feels for it—a

AN EXTRACT FROM JUDGE DEEMER'S LECTURES

TO The JUNIOR LAWS

YOU have no doubt concluded upon the adoption of the law as a profession, and while some of you will no doubt tire of its drudgery and forsake this avocation for the more lucrative employment within a few years, yet you will find the years spent in the study of the law will not be wasted. A course in law is generally regarded as essential to a liberal education; and I think I am justified in saying that two or three years in a law school has no equivalent in any other branch of learning. So that should you finally abandon the profession for more attractive and enticing fields, I know you will never regret the expenditure of time and money needed to acquire an elementary knowledge of law.

Some of you may have visions of wealth before you. If you have ever indulged in such dreams, it is well for you to awake from your somnambulist state to a stern realization of the fact that such dreams rarely, very rarely, materialize.

The rewards in our profession are the smallest offered for the same amount of labor that are given in any of the fields of human endeavor. The same amount of effort and energy expended in mercantile or agricultural pursuits, in manufacturing or jobbing, will bring triple the returns. Disappointments will be fewer, gains larger, life less perplexing and the road smoother in any other employment. If then, your love for a woman, which typifies liberty and trusts only in God, passeth all other desires, you had better forsake the law, for she is an exceedingly jealous mistress, and will no doubt desert you.

There are rewards for the lawyer greater and grander, richer and more precious than money, although money is not to be despised, much less not sought after. The true lawyer has ever and will for all time stand at the head of the procession in every community. He is the Ward McAllister of the true aristocracy in this country—the aristocracy of learning. He has always and will forever fill the important positions of honor and trust in this government of law. He is the conservator of the peace; the arbiter of sacred rights. He is the great conservative element in our social compact, who stands as a bulwark between our sacred liberties and the howling mob. He is not only the advocate of the rich but the defender of the poor. Passion does not blind, wealth allure, or position spoil him.

He is the embodiment of honor, and the soul of integrity, as ready to condemn vice as to extol virtue. He lives well—sometimes beyond his means—and almost invariably dies poor. He is a money maker but a poor accumulator. But if he is thoroughly wedded to his profession, the financial rewards are certain and oftentimes larger than come from the pursuit of any other business.

He must have genius for the law. He must be in love with his profession. He must enjoy the solution of legal questions, must be able to master dry details. He must be a student of human nature and have an immense store of good common sense. He must be able to tell what he knows and know what he tells. He must be honest with himself, with his client and with the court. His character must be above reproach and his conduct circumspect.

Lawyers are made, not born. Drones have no place in our profession. He who has selected the law as a means to escape labor has no doubt chosen well, for no work will be required of him. Lord Eldon said, that "in order to become a great lawyer a man should live like a hermit and work like a horse." If you would reach the highest pinnacle, you cannot do so by standing still, looking, admiring and wishing you were there. You must labor with the energy of a Hannibal in scaling the Alps.

EANDER SIEG rushed home from school,
For nothing stopped or stayed he.
The reason was quite plain to see,
Before him strolled a lady.

"I have a way of skating new,
Imported fresh from Paris,"
Said he, "we'll try this way tonight,
If you 'twill not embarrass."

"The ancient mode of holding hands,
Is sadly out of date;
We'll introduce to Iowa
The proper way to skate."

'Tis well this new Parisian mode
Was not to be attempted,
And may this school from all such styles
Forever be exempted.

Where humble knees had pressed the ice,
Were found two large depressions,
The depth of which betrayed too well
The length of his confessions.

With burning words though freezing knees,
He bravely had besought her;
But no! Her father lost a son—
His father lost a daughter.

His Royal henchmen brought him home,
Returned his billets-doux,
Prescribed the highest potencies
Of bluing for the blues.

A SHORT HISTORY of ~~The~~ FRESHMAN-SOPHOMORE SCRAP AS IT SEEMED TO A JUNIOR

QUIETLY the Freshies had canvassed the town for weeks looking for a hall, house, barn or any place where they could hold their exhibition of infantile phenomena, and it is said that they even asked Jimmy for a part of the campus but were promptly driven away by that dignitary. They finally found a man who pitied their helplessness and consented to allow them to use his hotel on condition that they pay for the building in advance and hire men to remove the deposits of various material which were sure to accumulate on the eventful evening.

Steere and Burkheimer engaged rooms and took up their residence in the hotel a week before the social in order not to miss anything, and the other Freshies moved<sup>d</sup> their extra suits down there and stored them in the attic.

Meanwhile "Skeeter" Burbanks, Ben Wyland and other Phi Beta Kappa candidates, in the fullness of their wisdom as Sophomores, did with malicious intent devise many and divers plans of entertainment for the Freshies, their inspiration coming from copious quantities of Duke's Mixture and other compounds of hay. Their only rule was "Tradition must be maintained," and it was seriously suggested that the band be sic'ed on the Freshies but this was overruled as unnecessarily cruel.

Friday afternoon, immediately after drill, the Freshies made a rush for the Berkley, and with their uniforms, they made a very soldierly appearance as they all tried to crowd into the door at once. The Sophomores failed to interfere with them for the renowned "Skeeter," the master-mind of the Sophomore class, was busy admiring himself down in "Fats" mirrors.

After supper the Sophs commenced to appear in their last summer's clothes, and prowl around the streets in bunches, being very careful to keep out of the way of any Freshies and yet make as fierce an appearance as possible. The Freshmen were all in the hotel by this time except one Magowan who was jabbing pool balls around at Epeneter's and explaining how he was going to whip the whole Sophomore class. The Freshies looked upon the aforesaid gentleman as a conquering hero, the impression being helped along by his many stories of athletic prowess, and their joy was great when he finally appeared among them.

The Sophs gathered around the hotel, when they knew they were safe, and watched the Freshies inside smoking "two-fer's" and excitedly playing ping-pong.

The Freshman girls assembled in the drawing room the best they could, and it is said that the Hon. Charles Bell served as guard in several cases. The usual white graduating dresses were much in evidence and the sighs of relief were long and loud as they came into the range of Dean Young's protecting gaze. Alas! This will probably be the only time in their careers that her appearance will be welcomed. They proceeded to the hotel under her protection, and with such an escort, their safe arrival was assured.

About this time the valiant police force began to take interest in the proceedings, and upon their first appearance the festivities commenced. A brick was wafted through the air and the window came up smiling a broad and jagged smile. The fall of eggs of the vintage of '93 was continuous and the effect beautiful. One of the policemen was badly injured trying to crawl under a bed in the third story, the coveted space being already occupied by others of the force.

The event of the evening was now at hand. A skunk made its debut in the ball room and being inquisitive, approached Eastman, the general factotum. This gentleman neglected an unequalled opportunity for studying natural history first hand and made frantic efforts to climb a palm tree, meanwhile yelling for the militia. The Freshies did not wait to see the performance but all tried to pass through the door at once. The result can be easily imagined. The next day Berkley's bill was so long that it came in sections and the grand jury made an attempt to get into the limelight, but their efforts amounted to nothing. The large amount of free advertising caught Prexy's eye, and the Sophomores began to come up on the carpet. This annual pilgrimage to the office is to be expected and those who received no invitation believed themselves slighted. The usual rumors of wholesale expulsion followed, and Berkley practically demanded pay for all the losses of the last five years. Finally, the class decided to pay for part of it, but not until after a fiery speech by Chairman Morris, in which he quoted from the Declaration of Independence, Shambaugh's "Iowa Journal of History and Politics," Ayer's Almanac and other authoritative and historical documents. Thus the incident was closed and the freshman have been properly introduced to the moral and æsthetic atmosphere of the New University."

DENTS IN RHYME

THE Junior Dents are a wonderful class
And certainly fair to see,
They fill bone teeth from morn till night
But charge not a single fee.

They furnish the Cole and the genuine Erb,
Of which none need have Fear,
For if the Erb doesn't take effect,
Next comes Rawhouser-Bush beer.

The boys adore Miss Tinker's voice
While she coos like a dove;
And all Bidwell to do the Wright,
Inspired by daily Love.

Beneath the Bowers, upon the Moss,
They sit and tell the Story
Of Foxy Grandpa on his Nies,
Ascending into glory.

The Gardner wears a McIntosh,
The Miller says he's slow,
But he flies up in a terrible Huff
And explains he has lost his Doe.

And thus it is with noble men

Dr. Clarke (to dreamy Junior): "What would be a good way to insure plenty of well ventilated rooms?"

Sleepy Junior: "Build an air castle."

Miss Safley: "Oh, I just had a grand time during vacation,—played solitaire all the time."

Dr. Littig, quizzing in practice: "Miss Morgan, what is one of the important causes of nervous dyspepsia?"

Miss Morgan: "Bad living."

Dr. L.: "Well, Miss Morgan, do you think the liver has much to do with this?"

Mr. Carle: "Say Miss Morgan, do you suppose you could get a person in shape for a dance by the 37th?"

Miss M.: "Why! that depends upon the person."

Mr. C.: "Well then, do you think you could get me in shape? I haven't much of an ear for a tune, but I will try."

AN IOWA ALPHABET

A Stands for Anatomy
Harder than -- well,
Just go ask some Medic
And he soon will tell.

B Stands for booze,
And likewise for "bun"
Just see, dearest reader,
This student has one.

C Stands for Chemistry
Under "Tuffy," you know;
If you cram all the year
You've a ghost of a show.

D Stands for drill
And also for d-----;
Two words that we couple
As soon as we can.

E Is for Economics
As handed out by Loos;
And if you think you'd like it,
Go around and get a dose.

F Stands for "Fat"
Of billiard hall fame,
But don't hang around there,
Or you'll lose your good name.

G ... What a smell
That skunk did
make!
You ought to have seen
Doc Eastman quake.

H Is the hash,
Or the weekly review,
With which students are fed
When board's about due.

I Is my insolvency
That makes me feel so blue,
Aye, the I I'm eyeing now,
Is an I. O. U.

J Is for Jimmie;
May he long hold his job!
For he never will flunk us
"Fur Oi know yez, begob."

K Stands for the kegs
That we drain to the dregs,
Till the landlady says she'll report us.
To go home we're of mind,
But 'tis then that we find
That our legs will no longer support us.

L Is the lady
Whose name is Chase;
But what is the use
For Hill's in the race.

M Is the money
That you might have won
If your "Bob-tail" had filled
As it should have done.

N Is for Numskull--
The Instructor, you
know,
That's palmed off on the Freshies;
Yes, he's quite slow.

O Is for the Orator
Whose departure's almost due.
While you can't get too much
Gordon,
We have got enough of you.

P Stands for Prexy,
And Professor likewise.

And both these are dreadful
To the poor freshie's eyes.

Q Is the quiz,
That, we blush to discuss;
For we were asleep
When the Prof. called on us.

R Is the river,
That beautiful stream,
Upon which the co-eds
In Spring like to dream

S Stands for Shambaugh,
The student's true friend;
And Politics I
We all recommend.

T Is the trouble,
The working all night,
Which is generally done
When exams are in sight.

U Is the "University"
About which Prexy shrieks,
We've heard it night and morning
For weeks and weeks and weeks.

V Is the Victory
We seldom see.
They say some are coming,
But when will it be?

10 7-0!

W Stands for Wisdom
 But we don't stand for it;
 And for those who have this wisdom,
 This frame is made to fit.

X Is the Xtras
 That we charge up on dad,
 When we try to explain
 All the money we've had.

Y Is The Young
 Who makes the girls rage;
 But while Young is her name
 'Tis not so of her age.

Z Is the Zeal
 With which we've had to work
 To get out this thing,
 A verse at a jerk.
 We hope you will like it
 But yet if you don't
 Just get out your hammer,
 And knock all you want.

AN ERODELPHIAN-IRVING FARCE PRACTICE

: : : It was the regular evening for farce practice, and according to arrangements, Ethel came loaded with chafing-dish, alcohol bottle, cream pitcher, sugar bowl, pans, plates, and other paraphernalia necessary for a little informal fudge party after the practice.

After the spread, Ethel gathered up her many belongings and was about to depart when "Dad" — who had greatly enjoyed the fudges — gallantly took it upon himself to help her with the load. She remonstrated but Dad was "wise" and after some persuasion was entrusted with the burden. Down the steps they went, she in the lead and he following with the burden.

When the ground was reached, out stepped the noble "Jargon" who had been faithfully waiting, according to orders. The new alliance was soon formed and "Dad" at last saw his error, but alas! It was too late. The fatal blow had fallen. Now it was up to him to carry out his part. Manfully he trudged along, and joyfully the young people ahead chatted together. Did her smile repay him, think you, for his pains?

"Away they went, on pleasure bent,
And 'Dad' came following after."

A MAN'S A BOY FOR A' THAT

By LEILA KEMMERER,

BREAKING the silence Harvey said "As far as I can see, you're in for it, old man."

"Guess so. Might as well pack up," said the younger boy, rising and looking about the room with its poster-covered wall, and study table. "This is all I have to show for it," he added taking from a nail on the wall a tin cup tied with a piece of rope. "Just the same, I'm glad the Sophs didn't get it."

"Don't you think you could work the old—your father to let you stay? He didn't seem so very wrathful."

"That's because he was. He's always quiet then. No. No use. I just have to go, that's all."

"Glad I'm not a minister's son. I was mixed up heaps more when I was a freshie and the old man never did a thing. I couldn't do anything for you, could I?"

"No. He's down seeing the President now, and I guess that won't help me any. He knows I led the boys, but I couldn't stand there like an idiot and see them take the thing even if it was only tin; the idea is just the same. It's funny, but a fellow isn't built that way."

"Say, what I came up for, was to tell you the Sophs are going to put up a dummy between eleven and twelve, but I guess you're not interested now. Must be almost time. If it wasn't beneath my Juniorhood I might act in proxy for you."

"Thanks, but you'd better leave such things alone—that's my advice for the present, at least. Did that strike a quarter after? I'm to go and meet father to take him to dinner. After that we'll make our plans."

"Well, good luck to you, Roy. I hope I don't lose my room-mate," said the older boy laying his hand upon the other's shoulder as he left the room.

Roy Mason walked rapidly down Dubuque street with his hands pushed deep into his pockets. On the lapel of his coat was a small gold pin bearing the letters "M. H. S." and "95," His smooth face was serious with tightly compressed lips and dogged eyes. He almost collided with a hatless boy with torn sweater who ran up to him panting, "Hurry up Mason! The Sophs have a baby up. We must get it down before the classes come out at noon. Know where I can get any more?"

"No, I don't."

"Well hurry up and get there yourself. You'll be a big help," called the boy as he started off again on the run.

Mason walked on to Close Hall and looked down Iowa Avenue to central gate where a crowd of boys were collected about the large trees at the entrance between which hung a crib containing a rag baby with nursing bottles and placarded "Class of '99." At one side were a group of his classmates talking earnestly and every now and then looking toward the galling object which swayed between the trees.

The boy started towards them, stopped, jerked his hands out of his pockets, thrust them in again and turning walked back up Dubuque street. At Market he went west to the north entrance of the campus. Hurrying along with his eyes fixed on the stone walk before him he came to the Old Capital building with its colonial front and its stone steps ditched out by the wear of feet of senators, presidents of the University, and students. A tall man wearing a Prince Albert coat stood waiting at the top step with his back against the big white pillar. He had just taken off his hat and was wiping his forehead while the sun fell on his black hair threaded with grey. The boy greeted him with forced pleasure but his eyes were anxious. "Were you waiting long," he asked as his father came down to him.

"Not long. Where do you board?"

"On Iowa," answered Roy looking down central walk to the entrance where there was humming quiet before the storm. "Hadn't we better go out this way, though? It looks as if they are going to have a scrap there."

"We will go this way," replied his father with a frown on his smooth forehead. "Students have no right to make nuisances of themselves. It is beginning to strike twelve already."

At the first sound of the chimes a stray student or two began to come out of the various buildings. Then the city clock began with its sharp strokes mingled with the less distinct beats of the bell in Saint Mary's and followed by the heavy ring from Old Capital. Only a few strokes had sounded when the students began to pour out of doors on all parts of the campus. With cries of surprised indignation some ran from among the crowd and began to tear across the campus to the entrance.

In a minute all were hurrying toward the central point of interest, — the younger men with set faces calling to each other, the rest hurrying along with expectant eagerness. Mr. Mason looked on passively, and kept up his steady walk, while his son took each step resolutely, desperately and firmly as if all the powers upon earth were trying to drive him on, but he was holding back with his united mental and physical efforts. Several boys with coats open and faces flushed, passing on the run called "Hurry up, Mason," "Come on," "Get a hunch on you," as they ran by but he only shook his head. Down at the gate a boy clung half way up one of the large trees with some below pushing him up and others pulling him back. Several came running up to Roy and eagerly urged him to climb up an adjacent tree and from it swing over into one of those to which the crib was attached. They began to draw him toward the tree but he anxiously protested. "I can't, boys. I can't."

"You won't get hurt," "You can't fail, it isn't far across," "We'll keep them off," "We would be sure to get it," "You climb like a cat," "It's for the class, come," all greeted his protest. They caught his arm to draw him toward the tree, but followed his worried glance toward the man at his side and desisted.

By this time such a crowd of jostling spectators had collected that Mr. Mason and his son could not make their way through. Roy suggested going around but his father answered that might as well see what there was in it that would make a boy so willing to disgrace himself. A man in red and white sweater had climbed up the tree which had been pointed out to Roy. As he swung safely over into the other a cheer rose from the crowd. The Sophomores who had been on guard lower down in the tree began climbing up to check his progress. Below, the crowd shouted suggestions, quieting down at a critical moment only to break forth again more loudly. Ten or twelve freshies made a dash at the foot of the other big tree and a man was starting up the trunk, but dropped instantly down amid the crowd below. Then some one came running through the crowd, which parted at either side and a rope went whirling above the obnoxious cradle, but it was caught by hostile hands and pulled back. At the second throw Mr. Mason rose on his toes and ejaculated "Good," as it went over and twined around itself. When Roy asked his father if he had spoken he did not answer but began to push to the front through those who had gathered in before them. Some one tried to thrust a rope into the boy's hand but he drew back.

The crowd pushed closer. There were now three sophomores and two freshmen in one tree. A sophomore on top of one freshman pinned him to a branch, the other was slowly pushed off and forced to slide down. A murmur passed among the men while girl's voices were heard saying "Oh, how mean!" "I think they ought to have let him get it when he was so near." "They don't give the freshmen any chance!" A lighted torch flew toward the cradle but missed aim. Then another struck, but flew back. A third went far above and fell, still burning at the feet of a tall dark figure, which stopped, and picking it up threw it with sure aim into the crib while his clerical coat blew out behind. As the hateful rag baby caught fire, young hands seized Mr. Mason's old ones and patted him on the back. Surprise, realization, shame, crowded over his face as he pulled away and began moving off, but the crowd were all intent upon the conflict and would not make way. A great cheer made him look again toward the trees. The fire had been extinguished but the tree was nearly full of Freshmen, some holding down the Sophomores, and others cutting at the rope. Creak! Crack! It broke and the '99 baby fell into arms reached up to catch it. A mad rush was made down the street while those behind jumped upon the crib and broke it to splinters.

The crowd was cheering madly and shouting for the "Freshies, '99." Amid the confusion Mr. Mason turned to his son and said with assumed indifference, "Let's go to the hotel for dinner. Which is the best one?" As they crossed the street he suggested, "If you have time we might look around town this afternoon and see if we come across anything to add to your room."

THE SECURING OF THE THIRD JUDGE FOR THE IOWA-MINNESOTA DEBATE

The following is the conversation which took place by telephone between Iowa City and Madison as overheard on this end of the line.

Prof. Loos (being called up by Madison): "Hello! Hello, Wisconsin. Hello! Is this Prof. Reinsh? Hello!

— Well, I am glad to see you — I mean hear you. Well, how are you, Professor?

— Yes. I am glad to hear it. And how is Mrs. Reinsh?

— Yes. How are your children?

— Yes. Well how is your work this year, Professor?

— I am very busy. You know Prof. Patterson left me.

— Yes. A judge for the debate. I guess we will have a good debate. What are your men, all Seniors?

— I say, are your men all Seniors?

— Yes. Ours are all Juniors.

— A judge? Yes. We ought to have a good man. Have you any one in view. (Several men were proposed until finally Mr. Bryan was considered).

— Mr. Bryan? (Turning about and asking the opinion of Iowa debaters). Hello! Hello! No, we don't want Mr. Bryan. I am afraid he would be prejudiced. His political views are too well known.

— Yes. Pres. Goddard of the Dearborn Nat'l Bank will be satisfactory.

— Where do you expect to spend the summer? In California?

— I expect to stay in Iowa City for the Summer Session.

— It is a very nice climate they have there. A nice climate.

— Well, I guess we better stop talking. I hope to see you at the debate."

ALPHA KAPPA OMICRON

Alpha Kappa Omicron is a local Greek Letter society, the organization of which was first proposed by Dr. A. A. Knipe, late director of physical training of the University of Iowa. The organization will be a secret one to which only official wearers of the "I" are eligible. The object of the "I" fraternity will be two-fold. First, to bring the athletes of the University into closer relationship; and secondly, to promote and aid athletics, thus effecting better organization in general and endeavoring to raise the standard of Iowa athletics.

The University authorities have granted them the use of the second floor of the armory for chapter halls and lounging rooms. These will be fitted up by the organization and will be made their quarters for the time being. The ultimate object, however, is to secure a chapter house. The present outlook is such as to warrant abundant success to the new organization and to make it an important factor in Iowa's future athletics.

HISTORY of The DENTAL COLLEGE

REAT has been the progress, wonderful the development of the Dental College of the University of Iowa. From an obscure home in the basement of "Old South Hall" to a magnificent three-story, brick building on the north side of the campus is a part of its rapid growth.

When the college was opened, the professors, instructors and demonstrators numbered six; the course offered was for two years, of six months each. The first year was devoted to lectures and laboratory work. The second to lectures and clinic. The clinic room was furnished with fifteen old barber chairs, purchased by the state, and the other furnishings were as crude.

When the college was opened in October, 1882, fourteen students were enrolled — eight in the senior and six in the junior class. One year's work was allowed to those who had practiced. From the very beginning the growth was phenomenal. In 1895 the college was located in its present home, the teaching force had been increased, the course enlarged and time lengthened to three years, which was changed in '97 to three years of nine months each.

At the present time, the faculty numbers thirty. Four demonstrators were added at the beginning of this school year. The college offers in laboratory, four courses for practical work: prosthetic, operative technic, orthodontia technic, and tooth technic. In these different laboratories the student is required to spend thirteen months.

"Sissy" Tinker to McConaughy: "For two cents I'd call you the worst name I could think of!"

When a student enters the clinic, the cases found will not be new, for his drill in laboratories has been excellent. The clinic is a neat and well furnished room, contains sixty-five chairs, fifty of the latest type, forty of which are fitted with fountain cuspidors. The college has ninety cabinets, so that each student has an individual chair and a place for his instruments. The popularity of the clinic increases each year. In 1901 and 1902 the number of patients was 9272 against 2202 in 1891 and 1892, which goes to show that the students, under the supervision of the able demonstrators, do good work.

The number of students has increased from fourteen in 1882 to one hundred and fifty in 1903, but with the dental college numbers is not the object, but to give to the graduates sufficient knowledge to become excellent dentists, an honor to the profession, and a credit to the institution. In order to bring about such a result demonstrators in each department of the college have been added, so that each student gets individual attention which enables him to do excellent and efficient work and insures his success in actual practice.

The alumni number over five hundred, some holding responsible positions as professors and demonstrators in other colleges. To the loyalty and labors of those who are practicing, a part of the college's success is due.

It is one of the ambitions of the faculty of the college to keep up, if possible, just a little ahead of the times, in the profession. The college has not all the appliances and expert instructors desired, but as time goes on, these will be added. In comparison with other like institutions and of corporation schools, this college has no equal in the west and compares favorably with the best of the far east.

Blacksmith-Woodruff trying the knockout blow.

In October, 1903, the college will be of age, having been organized just twenty-one years. The course will be changed, the time lengthened to four years of nine months each, more work will be given in the laboratories and clinic, the standard of proficiency will be increased. To be a graduate from the Dental College of the University of Iowa, with the degree D. D. S. means something, carries weight with it.

To make this college the very best; to give the most thorough instructions; to graduate the best dentists in the United States is in the heart of the dean and the faculty. May the college progress in the future as in the past.

A HAMMERFEST *

ACH grasping tightly his beloved hammer, the delegates to the Hammerfest arrived early upon the scene, and judging from appearances, all were determined to knock to the limit of their power.

The badges, a pair of hammers rampant upon an anvil, being shown to Knocturnal Knocker Bedford at the door, the members at once took their places at their respective anvils. These badges are certificates of ability in knocking and may be rented from the registrar for $12.50 per semester. A constant tapping was carried on as the delegates arrived and greeted each other, which increased in volume as the time for the arrival of the Great Iconoclast approached. At last, this official entered, preceded by an immense hammer, the insignia of his office, and was greeted by a round of hearty knocks by the members.

The meeting was opened with a knocking solo by H. M. Prate, accompanied by Wassem on the bass drum. Mr. Prate has the enviable distinction of being the only living man who knocks in different tones at the same time. Mr. Cushion then gained the floor, and by a succession of masterful knocks on logic, kept the house in an uproar. His rendition was interrupted from time to time by frightful crashes, as the members expressed their appreciation of some particularly staggering knock. Mr. Cushion's anvil was an especially responsive one and the infinite variety of knocks he produced proved him to be a master of the hammer.

A. Striker now advanced to the great anvil and delivered his famous knockabout in three parts, entitled "The Hawkeye Board." The execution of this number was perfect and the technique of the performer truly marvelous. Long practice has made his performance almost perfect and he is probably one of the greatest living knockers. Following this was a delightful little nocturne executed on the piano by Miss Fourx, the famous knockerette after whom the well known brand of coffee is named. The conclusion of this number was the signal for a furious round of knocks by all present, the knocking of Miss Plumtree being especially notable.

The event of the evening was now at hand: Several steam trip-hammers and pile-drivers were brought in and the members again grasped their hammers and took their places behind their anvils.

The speaker of the evening now appeared, Hon. R. A. Kook, K. K. G. (Gracious Knocker of the Knock). His oration on the subject "The Ethics of the Knock, Its History and Some Examples," made a hit. The speaker argued that knocking was a profession rather than a trade and his long experience makes him authority. Knocks were present among prehistoric peoples, as is shown by the number of crushed skulls discovered among the relics of ancient times. The evolution of knockers can be traced down to the present time. The speech was well delivered and important points were further emphasized by the steam hammers and pile-privers in a most startling manner.

The conclusion of the discourse was greeted with the greatest, loudest and most prolonged series of knocks ever heard in that hall and the meeting was brought to a close by all rising and joining in the "Anvil Chorus." The delegates then filed out, chanting solemnly

The ANT AND The GRASSHOPPER

By CARL V. KENT

WARREN looked up quickly over his glasses as his roommate entered, slamming the door behind him, then bent his thin face earnestly over his notes again. He was a small, dark-eyed fellow in a faded black suit a little worn at the elbows and somewhat loose.

Carder stuffed his red gloves into his cap and threw it at the bookcase.

"Great Scott, man, this is Friday night?" he cried walking around the table. Warren glanced up again with an irritated look in his sharp eyes. His room-mate pulled off his coat and loosened the collar of his blue shirt.

"It's an awful strain on me to have you plugging away these winter nights," he added, "All Juniors naturally that way?"

"No," said Warren sharply, dipping his pen into the ink. Carder took a tobacco sack from behind the clock and filled his pipe.

"Now, Ed, this won't do. First thing you know, somebody'll get next to this deal and my reputation will be ruined. You ain't enjoyed ten minutes between halves this year, since I roomed with you. Join the procession, don't dig potatoes while it's going by."

He sprawled down on the lounge, one foot on the book-shelf, the other placed carefully in the waste basket. "Take a rest," he concluded.

Warren looked up suddenly with an angry frown. "I'd feel ashamed if I did. I came down here to study, and to loaf around that way is—is criminal."

A surprised expression spread over Carder's freckled face. He blew out a cloud of smoke and took his pipe from his mouth.

"Why, a fellow's got to rest once in a while!"

"Rest! Who's got time to rest here? I'm down at the University to study and get the best out of life, and you're down here for the same thing, — at least that's what your father sent you for."

"Aw shucks, Warren," interrupted Carder, sitting up and pulling at a lock of his unruly hair. But Warren continued, picking nervously at the tablecloth: "What are you making out of it? Football season, I didn't see you look at a book for weeks. Just compare your people with the other side, who don't take a rest, — not even once a month. Look at Hudson, see what he's getting out of his time here. He's on our side. He don't fasten himself on one end of the pipe nights and watch his brains curling out of the other."

Carder made futile puffs at his own pipe but it had gone out.

"Oh, well, old man, you can talk me blind but you do get something out of seeing all the fellows. Know Hudson?" he added suddenly.

"Only in classes," answered Warren opening his note-book again. "But I can infer the rest."

Carder winked gravely at the clock. "I'm going over to see Ballard tonight, he rooms at the same house; and say, you can come over and get that geology manual of Hudson's you told me to get for you last week. I forgot it."

"I know you did, I suppose as you say I'll have to get it myself," he concluded, shutting the ink-well. "I guess I'll get it now."

A misty half-moon hung in the south and the snow crushed under their feet as they walked over. In a few minutes they reached the house.

As Warren followed Carder's active leaps up the stairs he heard laughing and eager talking above. "Hudson must have a hard time studying in this house," he thought to himself. Then he was surprised by a cheer in what seemed to be Hudson's voice. They stopped at the door.

"Well, come in!" His room-mate opened the door and Warren stood on the threshold astonished.

The room before him was long and low. Overcoats and caps were piled promiscuously on the lounge and a small desk, and even the floor had its quota. Around the table sat five or six fellows, most of them in sweaters, one dealing out a pack of cards as they talked and joked.

On the opposite side from the door sat Hudson. Warren could scarcely believe his eyes. But there he was, with that square face and prominent hooked nose. His thick hair stood up in a tangled mass, the faded sweater that he wore clung close against the rounded muscles of his arms and shoulders.

"Why, hello, Warren, glad to see you," he said, rising. "Take off your overcoat," and he introduced him around. There was Ballard, the base ball man with the "I"; Steele whom he otherwise knew as a grave and reverend senior, now in his shirt sleeves and smoking a villainous cob pipe; two classmates, and a medic who had not yet taken the trouble to remove his hat. Hudson! Warren dazedly put on his spectacles and looked again.

"My night off," said Hudson. "A little original research among the higher vertebrates," he added, smiling. "Won't you join in the game?"

"No," answered Warren hastily, "—I just stepped in to borrow your manual."

"Oh yes,—but sit down and forget it for a few minutes anyhow. Hoyt's to be over here with a coaster tonight and we're going down to Mill Hill when he shows up. Stay and go with us, Warren. There's some pretty nice plates I want you to look at if you don't care to play," he continued rising and getting out a portfolio of blue prints and biological drawings. Warren hesitated then sat down.

"I'm in this game," broke in Carder who had as usual taken off his coat and rolled up his sleeves.

With a few words, Hudson resumed the game. Warren looked over the drawings slowly. He had heard of them before and they were even better than he expected. As he was finishing a tall, soft-eyed freshman entered the room and was introduced to him. Preferring to watch the game, he also sat down on the lounge. Warren essayed a few remarks but the freshman answered timidly until Hudson was accidentally mentioned.

"He knows just how homesick a fellow feels," he explained confidentially. "He found out last fall how discouraged I felt and every night he stopped in to talk and finally got me to coming over here sometimes." Warren was watching the game.

"Set Ballard three more!" laughed Carder pounding the table.

"Say, fellows," said Lovejoy, "Steele's flush this week, let's start him after something to eat."

"Take a jump at yourself," retorted Steele. "Search me," and he held up both hands.

"Everybody ante up," shouted Carder passing round with his cap into which he had dropped a lead dollar as a starter. He collected an array of nickels and dimes and two quarters.

"Here, freshie," said Steele turning round, "run down and get what Hudson tells you. Be sure and come back tonight," he called, as the freshman started downstairs.

Hudson's room mate came in. A chorus of groans met him. "Which one tonight, Babe?" Three to one, it's Fanny." Holy smoke, look at that shirt!" I'd accept that shirt the first time it proposed to me."

Babe smiled. "I've heard all that drool before. Say Frank, I want your cuff buttons."

"Great Jernsalem, he's wearing a thirteen cent necktie!" gasped Carder. "Will some kind gent in the audience pass me a glass of water," he added weakly.

"That's not original either," answered Babe disappearing through the curtained doorway.

Warren was watching the face of the man before him, with its dark, clear complexion, the smile flashing suddenly into an enthusiastic laugh and through it all, the subtle management of the crowd at the table. Suddenly a shout was heard. Hoyt, his stocking cap pulled down to his eyebrows, banged the door open and yelled: "L abo-ohd!" in the most approved railroad style.

"Hurrray for Hoyt!"

"Which first, fellows," cried Hudson, "Grub or slide?"

"Slide," they answered hunting for caps and coats.

Warren was putting on his gloves.

"You're going with us?" said Hudson putting his hand on his shoulder.

"Why,—I believe I'd better go up to the room."

"Say now, Warren, you come along. Just once now and then,—we'll all be getting old some day, you know. You're coming?"

Warren's room-mate was grinning at him.

"All right, then," he answered suddenly.

"Good boy. Any of you fellows want more caps and mits go into the bedroom and take all you can find."

As Warner helped the rest of the noisy crowd pull the coaster down the street he felt the blood surging in his veins under the biting cold and he breathed faster. It was pleasant to be treated as one of the fellows.

They stopped at the top of the hill and piled on, Hudson sitting in front to steer. The landscape before them lay dark and mysterious under the faint rays of the misty half moon.

"Everybody on? Push her off," yelled Hudson, bracing his feet.

The coaster started slowly and the runners creaked. Then gathering momentum, faster and faster it shot downward, at times leaping clear from the track and springing heavily as they came down to the ground again. The whistling wind stung their faces, the sled rocked as they swooped around the bend in the road and out on the long level until they stopped far below.

As Warren rose, the tears ran from his eyes with the bitter wind. Suddenly someone cheered and he joined his clear voice to their hoarse, exuberant "Who - wah - wah!" Then he yelled by himself and Carder laughed. They ran most of the way back to the top, talking and laughing. Warren found himself wonderfully short of breath.

"Ten years since I did anything like this," he gasped to Hudson.

Down they went a second time. "Hold'em, hold'em, Iowa!" they shouted as the runners cut into the deep ruts at the bottom. Again and again, with now one steering, now another, they followed the long icy tracks, straight as an arrow. A little pang of envy seized Warren at the sight of the big steersman in front, his whole body tense and steady as he guided the leaping thing beneath them.

Carder had found a single sled somewhere and was amusing himself by trying to stand on it and slide. After a particularly disgraceful fall while he was digging the snow out of his collar, Warren yelled: "Enjoying yourself?" Don't I look it?" he replied, picking up his cap. "I got off backward last time.

"Hello, ten o'clock," cried Steele as the slow tones of the bell were heard.

"I ought to go home and study," said Carder solemnly.

"Yes, you ought," answered Hudson. "One more slide, boys."

"I'll push off," cried Warren. He jumped on behind on his knees, breathing hard. It was like the old hill at home years and years ago. They were going unusually fast. Someone waved his cap.

"Get down!" cried Hudson, "We're going to make a record."

Suddenly at the turn, a dark mass loomed up, — an approaching sleigh, — and Warren's heart pounded fiercely, then seemed to stop beating. The coaster swerved and Warren, losing his balance fell on the snow, rolling over and over. He heard someone cry out and caught a glimpse of Hudson springing from the coaster overturned in the drift beside the road; then he seemed to be lying still, the earth and sky whirling around in sharp succession. He saw a flash; something struck his head heavily.

Hudson was bending over him.

"Warren, Warren, old man!"

"Oh, I'm alright," he answered huskily, half dazed.

"Hurt anywhere?"

"Bird-house?" interrupted Carder, ruefully feeling of his own head. Warren nodded.

"It beats and aches considerably."

Hudson stood up, holding him in his arms. "I'll take you to your room," he said and started up the hill carrying his burden with scarcely quickened breath while the rest followed with the coaster.

"Warren, I was miserably reckless," said Hudson. "I got interested and forgot the danger."

"That's alright," said Warren. He closed his eyes wearily on the glittering stars and the reddish moon, sinking towards the horizon. He felt like going to sleep except for that throbbing in his head.

"I can walk the rest of the way," he said at the top of the hill.

Half an hour later, a cloth around his forehead, he sat before the register unlacing his shoe. As it dropped, he turned toward Carder at the wash-bowl. "Hudson is pretty strong, isn't he?"

"He's right in anything," murmured Carder through the suds, "O blazes, my mouth's full of soap!"

"And say, Walt, I wonder, — do they go over there much?"

"After this you come along once in a while and see," answered Carder.

"I will, Walt. Hello, I've broken my glasses!"

Mr. Thos. Farrell, post graduate, called on Miss Effie Blum, freshman. Most of the evening is spent in trying to trade numerous articles which he carries in his pockets.

At one time he is so unfair that Miss Blum is forced to throw a sofa cushion at him, whereat he clasps the said article firmly with his arm, saying:

“Ha! Another article of exchange.”

Miss B.: “Oh no, that belongs to one of the girls.”

Mr. F.: “I guess not now.”

Miss B.: “Mr. Farrell, do you own everything you have in your arms?”

Farrel, (with a sigh of longing) “N — — — no.”

One was his election into the Phi Delta Phi society, based always upon good standing in class. The other was his being assigned as justice in the moot court case of Kent vs. Wood set for hearing April 16, at 2 p. m. The latter notification was signed by C. N. ## IN The STUDENT'S EYE

This, like many another Diamond, is a native of South Africa, rudely torn from his native soil and bumped about this old world ever since. His father was a German by profession and gave his son a splendid education, starting him out early in life to bring home what he could. Not bringing in much, he soon found it necessary to divorce himself from his early surroundings and finally arrived in Iowa City, his chief as-et being a voice which would make a church bell sound cheap. This has served to rescue him from oblivion more than once, as it always supplies in volume what his opinions lack in common sense.

The name of STEPHEN HAYES BUSH may sound strange, but students must learn to associate it with the elongated, jack knife figure often seen crossing the campus. He moves as if going to a fire and his head is generally somewhat in advance of the rest of his anatomy. It is said that he gets this pose from the fact that as a distance runner at Harvard, it was his habit to always try to be in sight of the winner. This doubtless proved quite a strain on his eyes and gave him that hunted appearance. It is probable that as a result of his experience, he will provide the track men under his charge with small field glasses and thus avoid any permanent injury.

R. G. Cushing made his first appearance in University circles in the fall of '00. He alighted from the train one morning with a carpet bag in one hand and a Bible in the other and a card around his neck giving his name, age and destination. He was captured by the Y. M. C. A. and kept in seclusion for some time but finally escaped and took refuge in "Fat's" where he was safe from his pursuers. He has since learned to play billiards but his great reputation is chiefly due to his exceptional military career, even Col. Burnett taking pains to point him out in the middle of a lecture as an object lesson for freshmen.

IOWA MADGE YOUNG, is a true home grown product as the name implies. She hails from the margin of a lake of the Iowa drift, which is sufficient claim to fame, according to Prof. Calvin. Her specialty is zoology, in which field she has done some notable work, being chiefly responsible for the discovery of the fact that the ambulacral ossicles of the Phanerozonia Porcellanasteridæ Nidorella Armata do not decrease in size and number in the same ratio. This is one of the most important scientific discoveries of recent years, and rescues posterity from the horrible consequences of believing that the poor, old starfish is made as he ought to be.

Few would recognize that this is the gentleman who inquired of the Dean regarding prices of rooms in the collegiate building or who had to be informed that the statue in the lower corridor was not erected to the memory of a fireman, even though it stands beside a fire bucket. But it must be remembered that Mr. Melzner hails from South Dakota where the only bumps on the landscape are jack rabbits and his experience is yet somewhat limited. The story of his interview with the President in regard to the purchase of a military suit is unfounded, however, as he was only trying to pay his tuition to the janitor in the collegiate building.

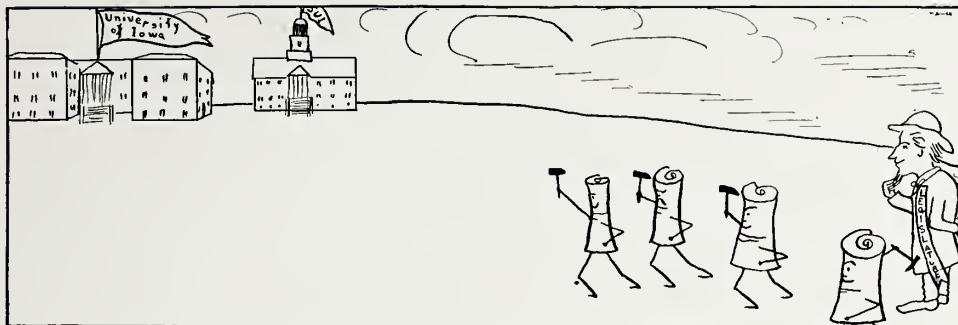

DR. F. E. HORACK has lately risen to prominence in University circles through his famous and oft delivered lecture on "Pennsylvania Politics" and his close connection with Shambaugh's advertising bureau and curio pawnshop. He is a home-grown product and spent his happy boyhood days bothering Jimmy and gathering shells on the campus. From here he went to Pennsylvania where he spent much time viewing the sights and learning the inner workings of the political machines. He afterwards went to Germany where he took a course in "weenies" and pretzels and spent most of his time chumming with the Kaiser, over whom he exercised no small influence.

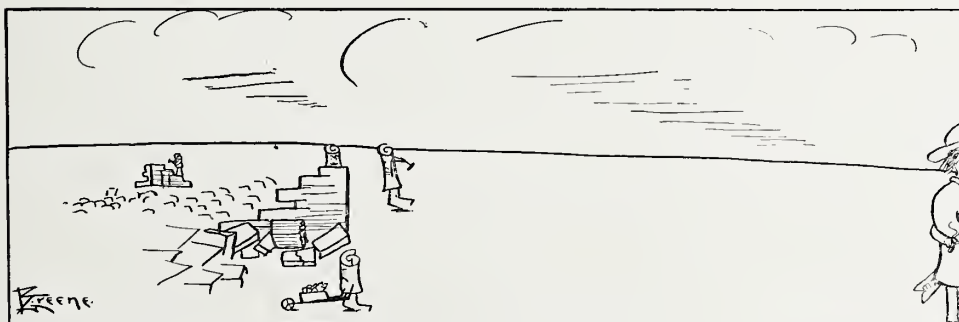

Mr. James G. Berryhill has lately brought himself into prominence by his strenuous but vain attempts to capture offices. His mild voice and smooth, easy, persuasive manner belie his office-grabbing tendencies which are probably due to the fact that he comes from Des Moines, where office-seekers roam the streets unrestrained. His chief claim to fame comes from the fact that he gets his picture in the HAWKEYE and graduates the same year, this being a feat heretofore unheard of in the history of the University.

"He took Phi Beta Kappa,
He captured Sigma Xi,
And other fields to conquer
He looked for with a sigh.
And then the truth dawned on him,
The horrible truth—Alas!
For he had never captured
An office in his class."

While the name ROY HARRISON BOSLEY may be familiar to the students, yet a few facts in regard to his career may not be amiss. He was born in Russia and like some girls, persists in never referring to the date of his birth. Early in life he took his parents by the hand, led them out to Iowa and planted them on a farm. His father was a lawyer and as the boy was his worst case, it was thought that the farm would act as a restraining influence upon him. He adopted trousers when about sixteen years of age and shortly afterward graduated from the farm with honors. He came to the University and specialized in economy both political and personal. One of his peculiarities is his marked parsimony regarding facts and this is especially noticeable in his recitations.

ODE TO JOHN G. BOWMAN

By a Freshman

O, oracle of learning, versed in English lore,
Tell us again of those great days of yore,
When Genius cut an unexpected caper
And you became "reporter for a paper."

Did you, with method pure, objective, visualize?
With pen inspired, describe and characterize?
Or with assorted terms create a mood
Portraying human nature, bad and good?
And did you often burn the midnight taper
While you were yet "reporter for the paper?"

Oh cruel fate, which on the Freshman smiled
And lured him here, a poor, untutored child,
Whose guileless verdancy made him an easy prey
To you, who e'en should guide him on his way,
To have his mind turned to a misty vapor
By you, who once "reported for a paper."

Miss Holt: "Mr. Seerly, give the first person singular of the present indicative of 'dormir.'"

Long pause, during which Mr. S. is evidently dreaming of a fair damsel in the class.

Mr. Seerley (waking suddenly, speaking to Miss Holt) "Beg pardon, Miss Lynch, did you call on me?"

Two of Fitzpatrick's brilliant sayings:

No. 1, in Chemistry Class: "The acid will have an alkaline reaction."

No. 2, at the theatre: "Now they're going to give us some of those illustrated pictures."

"Well Prescott, I suppose you are worrying some about your term exams aren't you?"
Prescott: "Oh, no. I'm not worrying. I'm making ponies as fast as I can."

Said a Senior bold, to the girl in red—
 To the girl with the twinkling eye,
 “The days grow short and time is long,
 Do we part then, you and I?”
 But the girl in red then shook her head
 With a smile that was coy and shy,
 “ ’Tis only too true, that I’m not for you.”
 ’Twas thus she made reply.

A Freshman trembled and pleaded in vain,
 For the girl with the twinkling eye,
 And a Sopomore rough, she dismissed in a huff,
 With “Your rude and you give me a pain.”
 But one night in June ’neath a sleepy moon
 To a Junior she whispered sweet,
 “You’re too old to be rude and too young for a prude—”
 And he kissed her, as it was meet.

Iowa Correspondent Comments on Arguments of Scientists.

IOWA CITY, Iowa, Oct. 25.—To the Editor:—Eminent men are discussing at last the greatest evil of the human race, viz., osculation. From time immemorial this habit has lived, but, thanks to “modern” science, its doom is assured. The promiscuous osculatory practice of the salty, having been demonstrated scientifically detrimental to public weal, should merit no consideration other than as a pernicious habit. Many forms of schizomycetes may be transmitted by osculation from one individual to another.

Alas! the many forms of perversion of the normal processes produced by labial touch are innumerable, nor is it wise, scientifically speaking, to so much as shake hands with a tubercular victim for fear of contamination. If people are going to be so degraded in this present age as to be guilty of embrace or osculation, then let us hail with joy the interposition of some impermeable screen warranted bug proof. The mother’s embrace must henceforth be shunned, nor shall sweet innocence play with other members of the rising generation.

We must and shall have hygiene, be the cost what it may, even to losing a good cook and attacking a restaurant cuisine, for surely dyspepsia, sensitiveness, hysteria or anything is preferable to the results of—a kiss.

The March wind, weary of blustering vain,
At last grew still. Then fell a rain
Of tears, and tears—soft April showers;
There April smiled and found May flowers—
Their leaves a-glisten with dew again.

A misty star
On a silver bar;
Or a drop of dew
With a sunbeam through;
The glint of a stream
Where gold sands beam
Put in a song
Faint
And far
For you
In a lyric gleam.

"The negative stated—a—"
Prepare for sleep.

Lonely, oh, so lonely since you went
As a little, pale star in the still blue of the night,
But love, if you are well content,
It must be right.

Burlington, Ia., Jan. 18, 1899
 The officers of the Merchants' Life Association are well known citizens of Burlington. Having been a policy holder with their company since its organization, I can say from experience that I believe the company is economically and honestly managed.
 WILLIAM CARSON, President

THE MERCHANTS' LIFE ASSOCIATION needs no other endorsement than that given by its unimpeachable record for fair and liberal dealings with its policy holders from the date of its incorporation, its present sound and prosperous condition, and facts and figures which it is always pleased to submit to the public upon application. In its home city it has over One Million And A Half of insurance in force and we are informed by the management that the present year is already a record breaker in respect to the amount of new business written.—Mercantile and Financial Times, New York.

Burlington, Ia., Jan. 18, 1899
 To whom it may concern:
 If you are contemplating investing in life insurance, I can cheerfully recommend to you the Merchants' Life Association of this city. The management of the association is composed of men of means and ability, careful, conservative and always on the alert to the best interests of the policy holders. Very truly yours,
